Dr. Rachel Read, Long Time Resident Of Japan, Only Osteopath In Country

By ROSE McKEE

KARUIZAWA, Aug. 20.—If a vote for the most popular feminine member of this resort were taken, Dr. Rachel Read would undoubtedly be the winner.

Being a pioneer member of this summer colony, Dr. Read grumbles good-naturedly about not being able to call every single member of the largest and most important summer resort of the Far East, by the first name as she was in the habit of doing when Karuizawa was young.

But a certain gentleman who walked along the Machi with Dr. Read the other day contends that her complaint is unfounded. If she doesn't have the first name of every resident on the tip of her tongue—although he swears she does—everyone knows her.

He said:

"I'll never walk down the Machi with Dr. Read again. In 10 minutes, my arm was worn out from tipping my hat to her innumerable friends."

There are many well defined groups here—the typical tourists, the mission workers, the business men and their wives and families, the diplomats, just to mention a few. Dr. Read, not being a member of anyone group, is loved by all groups.

She came to Japan many years ago, later to return to the United States. There she spent several years studying at a college of osteopathy in Philadelphia, returning to Japan to establish her profession some 30 years ago. She still is the only osteopath in Japan. Two physicians came after she arrived, but they stayed only a short time. She has made her summer home in Karuizawa for 20 years.

"Now Dr. Read would be a story for you," the summer residents tell the reporter. "I'd like to hear her adventures, she must have enjoyed many," they continue.

When approached on the idea, Dr. Read said no, there wasn't any story about her, she didn't want to talk, she wanted to play bridge. But between rubbers of bridge it developed that Dr. Read did have many adventures, even though she didn't term them such.

She had the time of her life during the great Karuizawa flood of 1910 when the waters of the various streams overflowed their banks and deposited silt partially burying hundreds of houses and raising the entire level of the Karuizawa plain by several feet.

Practically everyone in the village deserted their homes for the safety of the hills, but Dr. Read continued to live in the same home in which she now lives. The house then belonged to an elderly couple who fled. Dr. Read remained stranded upstairs with the flood waters depositing silt downstairs until all the mud and sand reached the level of her table tops. Friends bought her canned goods and eggs and she reached out of the upstairs window to get her daily flood ration.

Mrs. O'Brien, wife of the U. S. Ambassador who was then in Tokyo, feared to stay in her house alone during the flood, so she came to spend the nights with Dr. Read until the creek in the street swelled to such proportions that she was unable to cross it.

Meanwhile the water rose higher and higher, with no indications of abating. From the upstairs window, Dr. Read looked down on the most amazing costumes she has ever seen. With their clothes wet, residents were going about in the most impromptu and ridiculous dress that can be imagined. Finally, when it looked as if every house were going to be a sailboat, even Dr. Read decided to abdicate.

She made this decision, typically, just at midnight. She put on two suits of clothes so she could be sure to have plenty of dry garments. Cautiously she stole out of the door. It was pitch dark and pouring rain. She took about three careful steps when plop, down she fell in the water and mud! Somehow, she scrambled to her feet and dashed, without caution, for the Karuizawa Hotel.

"The guests at the hotel had stayed up late to see if anything would happen. But just before I arrived, despite their anxiety, they had gone to bed. When I rang the doorbell, everyone tumbled out of bed and rushed, in their nightgowns, to the door to see what the excitement was. There I stood, covered with mud and water, from head to foot, a forlorn picture if there ever was one," Dr. Read related and laughed heartily at the spectacle she drew.

She said that when the flood was eventually over, every house was filled with sand. The elderly couple who owned the house in which she roomed, were hopelessly dismayed at the sight their house presented. The downstairs rooms were filled with sand to the tops of the tables. Their yard was buried deep.

Dr. Read told the old people that they shouldn't give up hope, that maybe they'd sell their house yet, maybe even she would buy it, for she had come to look on the old place with affection.

"Oh, if you only will," they replied, with the first smile on their faces in weeks.

Dr. Read said she would sleep on the idea. The next morning, she bought the house, furniture and all for a trifle.

"Read's Folly," the summer residents called it. They thought her mind must have been affected by the flood when they heard she had made such a ridiculous purchase.

But Dr. Read paid no attention to their gossip. She went ahead fixing up the house, levelling off the yard, and planting grass. Two summers later when the place looked quite respectable and livable, the same friends changed their tune.

"Weren't you fortunate to get such a buy," they told her, she related.

In The Earthquake

Dr. Read was in Karuizawa during the earthquake too.

"We were just coming out of the Karuizawa auditorium where we had heard a lecture when we saw the telephone poles and the houses shaking. We didn't know what it was but we all decided Mr. Asama had erupted," Dr. Read recalled.

"In the evening, when the sky cleared and we saw Mt. Asama pouring out its quiet stream of smoke as usual, we realized that it was something else. The idea of an earthquake suddenly streamed over us and that night many of the people went up to Sunset Point where they saw the red sky reflecting what they knew was Tokyo on fire.

With all communication cut off, with the railroads not running, we were weeks before we knew how terrible the earthquake was. Many residents started walking for Tokyo. Slowly the news leaked out to us. First one man came and we took him right to the auditorium and had him give a lecture on the disaster for it was the only way we could all hear the news at the same time.

"When one of us finally got a letter, we stood in the main street and read it to the crowd. As soon as others came from Tokyo, we took them, also, to the auditorium so that we could all hear at once. Finally the railroads started bringing in the refugees, many of whom rode on the tops of the cars. It was more than a week before I knew that my house and all my belongings had burned," Dr. Read said.

During her early years in Japan, Dr. Read had to do much educational work for osteopathy. The idea was entirely new. Some publicity given out by the late Dr. Inazo Nitobe introducing Dr. Read to the public had an immediate effect. Reporters wanted to know what osteopathy was and, due to the wide publicity, hundreds of persons crowded to her office to be cured of all imaginable troubles. But they all thought they could be cured with one treatment.

Gradually her business grew until now her daily schedule is so filled that she hasn't time for golf, which she enjoys playing. Her patients come from all countries of the world and she has gratifying letters from them written after they returned home. She has treated three generations of many families.

To her home at 1025 Shaw road, which is one of the oldest houses in Karuizawa, and to her home at 6 Reinanzaki, Tokyo, come friends not only with health worries but with problems of all kinds in which Dr. Read takes a personal interest and offers a solution which is invariably adopted with success.

Dr. Read came to Japan to make her home by way of Europe. She joined Mrs. Nitobe and the late Dr. Inazo Nitobe whom she had known for a long time, in Italy and came to Tokyo with them. Since then, she has returned to America several times and has completed a post-graduate course in osteopathy about which she said:

"A physician must possess and act upon the knowledge that the living organism, through millions of years of growth and adaptation, has developed a protective and recuperative mechanism which is supreme. When out of order, that mechanism may be aided by man but cannot be displaced nor opposed by him without danger of death to the organism. Whatever is accomplished in the healing of the body tissue is accomplished only through the creative forces inherent in living matter, operating through mechanical structure designed for the purpose. Has not nature's God been thoughtful enough to place in man all the elements and principles that the word 'remedy' means? In a living organism fighting disease the skilful correction of disarranged structure is essential to speedy and complete recovery."

"Perhaps the fact that I studied ballet dancing for many years, in fact from my childhood on, made me have a peculiar sympathy for the girl in this story. But I think it is even more than that. I think the spontaneous personality of Vicki is nearer to my own than the personality of any heroine I have ever portrayed on the screen. I never before have let my own personality be so dominant on the screen as I have in portraying this role."

Latham Attacks Countrymen On Trade With DEI

Exploiting Of Eastern Markets By Exporters Denounced By Attorney-General

A vitriolic attack upon Australian exporters who are exploiting eastern markets and seriously damaging Australia's reputation by selling short weight flour in bags and in other way taking advantage of credulous natives, especially in the Dutch East Indies, characterised the Attorney-General's (Mr. J. G. Latham's) address to members of the House of Representatives at Canberra, on his goodwill mission to the East, states an article in the Brisbane Telegraph.

Those exporters, said Mr. Latham, should be excluded from overseas trade in the interests of the Commonwealth. Their dodges might get them trade for a time but there would be inevitable and serious consequences to the country to which they belonged. Some of them sold inferior canned and tinned goods to the East though Australia could produce goods equal to the best in the world.

Mr. Latham stressed the warmth with which the Good-will Mission was received in all the countries he had visited. He had returned to Australia with the feeling that there was a very real desire for friendship with Australia. Officials with whom informal trade discussions took place were vehement in declaring that a great opportunity existed for Australia to increase her trade if Australian exporters studied market requirements, paid more attention to quality standards and used more attractive labelling.

Trade Situation

Reviewing the trade situation Mr. Latham said that recent American legislation would cause a rapid diminishing of Australian trade in meats, butter and flour with the Phillippines. Perhaps no market offered more difficulties than China. Competition was keen and China, essentially an agricultural country, had a low purchasing power. She had 400,000,000 people, but they were not prosperous and under existing conditions her wheat market was closed to us.

Japan, however, has made a direct request to him for a trade commissioner and in a special report he was preparing he was dealing with this and other trade matters for use by the Minister for Commerce (Mr. F.H. Stewart).

Dutch Friendship

In the Dutch East Indies he had found much friendship for Australia. Officials there believed that they and Australia would continue to have a great deal in common in facing the problems of the Pacific. Hoping and expecting that there would be a greater liaison in future between the two countries they appeared to do everything possible to attain their objective.

On Personal Note

As this was virtually his swan song in the House, Mr. Latham concluded on a more personal note.

"I entered this Parliament not only in the interests of Australia," he said, "but in the interests of the general welfare of humanity and in the hope that I would be able to do something for the world as a whole. I will be more than satisfied if at the end of my political career I have been able to make a contribution, however small, towards the maintenance of peace."

Mr. Latham left Camberra last night for a station, of which he is part owner, on the Western Queensland border, 300 miles north of Bourke. He will remain there about a week.

Heat-Crazed Grizzlies Kill Keeper In Zoo When He Turns Water On Pair In Denver

Two huge grizzly bears, maddened by the heat, attacked and killed their keeper, Charles E. Wyman, as he was cleaning their pen at the Denver city park zoo in July 17, according to the New York Times.

Scores of persons, attracted by the roars of the bears and the shouts of the 70-year-old keeper, stood by, powerless to aid. Zoo guards attempted to drive off the enraged animals by shotgun fire, but the buckshot seemed only to arouse the bears to greater fury.

Police were called, but before they could reach the scene Wyman had been mangled fatally.

After they had killed their keeper the bears slunk into their den. Officers enticed them out with delicacies, then executed them with rifle fire.

Wyman had been friendly with the bears for years, and had no fear of them as he entered their natural habitat pen to clean it.

He was washing the concrete floor with a hose and playfully turned the stream on them as he had done many times before.

With a roar of rage, huge Lady Yellowstone, who was brought as a cub from Yellowstone Park twenty years ago, turned on the elderly keeper, swiping him across the face with her sharp claws. Blood spurted from Wyman's wounds and he was knocked backward. Lady Yellowstone's mate, Teddy, rushed in and bowled the keeper off his feet.

Both roaring bears lunged upon Wyman again as he attempted to blind them by turning the full force of the hose into their eyes. They paid no attention to the strong stream of water, and clawed and mangled him.

Wymns was rolled over and over by the bears until he fell into a deep moat at one end of the pit. Then Lady Yellowstone ducked his head under the water and swam the full length of the moat with him.

Then the bears returned to their den, where they remained until lured out to be executed.

24 Incidents On Soviet-Manchou Border Recently

War Minister Discusses Subject At Cabinet Council Session

Speaking before the regular session of the Cabinet Council held at the Premier's official residence at 10:30 a.m. Tuesday, the War Minister, Gen. Senjuro Hayashi expressed deep regret over the successive incidents on the Soviet Manchoukuo border. The War Minister enumerated 24 incidents which had occurred on the border, in recent months.

He told his colleagues that 15 incidents were reported on the eastern border, five in Heilungkiang and four on the western border.

He expressed the fear that although the incidents which have taken place one after another are in themselves not of a grave nature, they will eventually harm border relations between the Soviet Union and Manchoukuo. While expressing his deep regret the Navy Minister, Adm. Mineo Osumi declared that the fishery grounds in Kamchatka are characterized by pleasant tranquility.

Immediately after the adjournment of the Cabinet Council, the War Minister, Gen. Hayashi in a press interview stated as follows:

"I explained to my cabinet colleagues the recent frontier incidents between Manchoukuo and Soviet Russia as I thought it necessary for the Ministers to be in touch with the matter in view of their serious nature.

"I think the frequent recurrence of incidents on the eastern frontier districts is due to the fact that the districts are close to Japan's first line and moreover, many anti-Japanese elements are rampant there. I do not know whether the Soviet side has provoked such incidents and is going to cause more hereafter in their intention to fool Japan or their fear against Japan. At any rate the matters deserve our keen attention.

"But such frontier incidents as have happened hitherto are all matters relating to Manchoukuo, therefore Japan is not in a position to give any suggestions or directions regarding them.

"The unpleasant incidents are not of a nature which Japan is unable to bear, but ones that can be amicably settled through diplomatic channels.

"Of course such frontier incidents as have happened recently are quite apt to arise between such countries as Manchoukuo and Soviet Russia but the incidents must be settled on each occasion."

League Awaits Soviet Russia's Knock At Door

Regional Pact Held Right Prelude To World Disarmament

League of nations has 55 members, excluding Japan and Germany, which have given two years' notice of intention to withdraw.

There are nine nations which are not members. Of this number, Afghanistan, Ecuador, Egypt, the Sultanate of Nejd, Russia, the United States and Yemen have never entered.

Brazil and Costa Rica joined, but subsequently withdrew.

Mexico gave notice of withdrawal in 1932, but this year announced the intention to retain its membership.

The Council comprises:

Three permanent members—Great Britain, France and Italy—excluding Japan and Germany, who have ceased to attend.

Ten smaller nations, elected annually from the whole membership on a basis of rotation, now including Poland, Czechoslovakia, Mexico, Spain, Panama, China, Denmark, Argentina, Australia and Portugal.

An extremely important document of which a great deal will hereafter be heard has been drawn up by the special committee of the Disarmament Conference, and the Governments which believe that the elaboration of regional pacts is a necessary preliminary to a reduction of arms are invited to conduct their negotiations with each other in accordance with the rules now laid down. The document acquires additional importance in view of Russia's expected adherence to the League, according to Christian Science Monitor's Geneva dispatch.

In some respects the report presented by Mr. N. Politis of Greece and approved, goes farther than the so-called Model Treaty of 1923. Notably it would authorize the inclusion of a definition of the aggressor in particular cases.

But it is made clear that the League and the Disarmament Conference do not countenance any regional pacts which are directed against nations which are not a party to them. Nor does it seek to confine the application of the pacts to a relatively small area—it would have them as comprehensive as possible. States which are not members of the League should likewise be brought in.

Should there be a general European pact? The question is left in abeyance pending the results of negotiations.

Starts New Era?

In certain League circles these conclusions are regarded as "the starting point of a new era of international relations." They are held to permit the conference, when once security is thus obtained, to proceed to its task of limiting armaments. This opinion may go beyond the facts, for doubts were expressed by Great Britain, and Germany stands outside, and Italy and Hungary are mere observers. Yet the report is so skillfully drawn, and sets down so many guiding points, that in view of the alarm felt at the construction of rival "blocs" and of hostile alliances in Europe, it is being carefully examined.

It will be remembered that the General Commission decided to appoint "a special committee to conduct such preliminary studies as it may consider appropriate in order to facilitate the conclusion of regional security agreements which may be negotiated outside the conference."

A technical committee, consisting of delegates of the United Kingdom, Finland, France, the Netherlands, Poland, Spain, Turkey, Yugoslavia, U. S. S. R. and Hungary (as an observer,) explored the various aspects of the problem.

Five Points

It made a number of general observations:

1. In the first place, regional security agreements should conform to the rules laid down in the big general pacts (League Covenant, Pact of Paris), and be brought into line with the special agreements previously concluded by the contracting parties, either between themselves or with third states.

2. Such agreements should not be directed against any power or group of powers. As was laid down in 1928 by the Committee on Arbitration and Security, "If some states hold that a guarantee is necessary in the case of aggression by third states, it may be held that it is not for the League of Nations, whose object it is to promote sincere cooperation between all its members with a view to maintaining and consolidating peace, to recommend provisions which might lead to the formation of rival groups of nations," and that "treaties of mutual assistance will be the more valuable and will more certainly merit the support of the League of Nations if they are in accordance with the precedent of the Rhine Pact of Locarno concluded between states which only a short time ago belonged to rival groups or states whose differences might endanger the peace of the world."

3. The term "regional security agreements" does not necessarily mean that the application of such agreements is strictly confined to a certain region. It may also be applied to agreements concluded between a large number of states.

4. As was pointed out in 1928 by the Committee on Arbitration and Security, it is advisable that European states which are not members of the League should also participate in these agreements.

Model Suggested

5. In seeking the most appropriate formulas for facilitating the conclusion of such agreements, there should be borne in mind, in addition to the Rhine Pact of Locarno and the Model Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1923, agreements concluded since that time and which are at present in force, such as the London Agreements of 1933 between 12 states on the definition of "the Aggressor," one of which is open to accession by all states, and the Balkan Pact concluded in 1934 between four states, which has been left open for the accession of other states of the same region.

These considerations led the committee to the conclusion that the basis which should be recommended to the Governments is that supplied by the Model Collective Treaty of Mutual Assistance (Treaty D). The reasons for this view are as follows:

(a) This text was "highly appreciated" and "recommended for consideration by the States Members or non-Members of the League" by the Assembly. (Resolution of Sept. 26, 1928);

(b) As at the time when it was adopted, it still represents a middle course between the various tendencies which have come to light in the matter of pacts of mutual assistance.

The Model Treaty in question is not framed as a rigid formula but, thanks to its elasticity, lends itself to such adaptation as may be necessary to suit it to the political and geographical requirments of the various parts of Europe and also to the European states. The contracting parties might, if necessary, introduce into the Model Treaty such modifications or additions as they may think fit according to the circumstances.

Finally, after examining the question whether, in addition to regional agreements, a recommendation should be made in favor of the conclusion of a European Pact of Security, or whether the sphere of application of the agreements would render the conclusion of such a pact unnecessay, the Committee took the view that those questions could be more usefully examined after the negotiations with a view to the conclusion of more or less extensive security agreements.

Germany Is Next?

GENEVA, July 21.—According to information from a reliable source it is the intention of Russia to forward its official application for admission to the League of Nations within the next week or so. There have been negotiations of a technical character which have removed final difficulties. Nothing now prevents Russia from declaring its candidature.

Nor does any doubt remain of its triumphant election at the next assembly. One or two countries appear irreconcilable, among them Switzerland itself, and there may be abstentions. But political agreements as to the desirability of voting Russia into the League is almost unanimous, and there is no reason for further postponement of the decisive step.

It is believed that Germany's wish to return will be greatly influenced by this example.

Observers see in this move a turning point in the history of the League, which was threatened with further defections which might have had most serious consequences. Now the tide has apparently turned and the future of the League is assured.

Russia's anticipated application for membership in the League comes at a critical moment when only three of the great powers remain within the fold.

The Soviet's attitude is all the more interesting in view of its sharp reversal of foreign policy from general distrust and aloofness to more active collaboration and possible membership.

It is sometimes said that one of the difficulties in the way of an understanding of Soviet foreign policy is that it differs as much from the foreign policy of the other great powers as the domestic policy of this first Communist state differs from the domestic policy of the countries belonging to the capitalist system and to the League of Nations.

The circumstances that have kept them apart for more than 14 years are largely due to internal affairs.

When the Soviet Government first came into power 16 years ago, its most pressing task was to rescue Russia from the conflagration of the World War.

The next three years saw the Government defending itself from nearly all its neighbors, and from a number of troublesome White Officers, who were supported by the allies. Thus Russia had no time to take part in the Paris Peace Conference, signed none of the peace treaties, and thereby excluded itself from original membership in the League. Nor was it at that time "recognized" either de facto or de jure by the other allied and associated powers.

Early overtures by the League governments were unfruitful owing to deep and not ill-founded distrust of allied motives. At this period, only the Norwegian humanitarian, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, succeeded in getting in, and through him the League was able to repartriate more than 500,000 prisoners of war. The next few years saw the development of a mild technical collaboration, but it was disarmament which finally brought the Russians to Geneva.

By 1927 Mr. Litvinoff appeared in person in Geneva as chief Russian delegate at the fourth meeting of the preparatory commission for the Disarmament Conference. There he proposed complete disarmament.

But this plan was rejected by the other governments on the commission.

Since the beginning of the Five-Year Plan, Russia's most direct contact with the League has been in connection with the Commission of Inquiry for European Union, its chief contribution being a "pact of economic non-aggression." This led to the idea of non-aggression in political matters as well, and paved the way for a very valuable contribution to the League's disarmament work, which the Soviet representatives supported throughout 1932 and 1933.

Vienna Courts Refuse To Doom Bombers To Die

Mandatory Death For Having Explosives Ignored, Only Mild Sentences Imposed

VIENNA, July 21—Despite the government's recent decree that all persons using explosives in crimes of political terrorism henceforth mandatory must die on the gallows, Austrian courts are displaying a surprising reluctance to impose the extreme penalty and in some cases have issued unusually mild sentences despite the new law, which became effective Wednesday midnight, says a recent article in the N.Y. Herald Tribune.

The leniency of the courts has aroused much anger in circles loyal to the government of Chancellor Englebert Dollfuss. Probably the outstanding example of the courts' attitude was at Graz, in Styria, where a special court-martial declared itself incompetent to judge the case before it, even though an act of public violence had been clearly demonstrated. There and elsewhere it has been made obvious that many judges do not wish to carry out the emergency legislation, which imposed death upon all connected with the use of traffic in explosives in any way.

"Reichspost" the government's Catholic organ, expressed its disappointment editorially over this development today.

"Such judgments," the editorial said, "are apt to force new crimes because political fanatics will believe that they are risking little when they defy the law."

The newspaper suggested that the Department of Justice take steps to give the juges a "more adequate notion of their responsibilities." The evening newspaper "Die Heimwelt" pressed its displeasure in even sharper language, saying that all loyal Austrians demanded that the courts change their attitude drastically.

Meanwhile, acts of violence continued unabated. In Vienna two Socialists, former members of the dissolved Schutzbund (the Socialist Army), were captured after they had dynamited the railroad tracks and shot down a policeman who had tried to intercept them. Another Socialist was arrested for the possession of explosives.

In the Tyrol the Mitenwald Railroad was mobbed again, and traffic on the line was paralyzed for hours. An electric transformer station was dynamited at another point in the Tyrol, while at Achenkrchen a woman and a child were injured critically when the almshouse was partially wrecked by the explosion of an infernal machine.

Many Austrian Nazis were arrested during the day because they had failed to surrender explosives to the authorities before the Wednesday midnight deadline. They, as well as the Socialists arrested, must hang if the government's decree is strictly enforced.

A trial of seven Nazis on terrorism charges here today disclosed that the Brown Shirts, in at least one case, have used the name of Henry Ford as an aid to getting explosives into Austria. One of the accused men, Karl Haun, who allegedly carried an infernal machine, hidden in a valise, into this country from Munich, told the court martial that he had got through the customs guard at the border easily by saying that he was carrying some equipment he had just got at a Ford plant in Germanyy.

The Fireproof Man

Singlee, the "Fireproof Man," who shows his art at the "Oddiorium" of the Century of Progress Exposition in Chicago, appears to be practically immune to fire. His parents, who belonged to a sect of fire worshippers in India, taught him at the age of 3 not to fear fire.

In the Odditorium performance, Singlee first takes a red hot bar of steel in his mouth and bends the bar with his teeth. Next he allows two assistants to play the blue hot flames of a gas blow torch on any part of his body. And finally he takes the same blow torch and passes the flame directly over his eyes while he looks straight into the blazing mouth of the torch, suffering no ill effects whatever.

Karuizawa Notes

Once again the ancient Bon-odori was danced in Karuizawa Wednesday evening and with it the joyous O-Bon season, honoring departed relatives and friends, came to an end.

Before the 300-year-old Ginguji temple, the circles of brightly clad dancers swept to the wailing beat of the drum—and the resounding notes of a phonograph!

True the song which the phonograph chanted was an old, old one but nevertheless many in the audience made haste to explain that this was an innovation—that the ancient Bon-odori dancers would have scowled on this modern gesture.

About the dancers, a large and appreciative audience formed a ring 10-men deep. The men and younger generation seems reluctant to join the dance. The older women with a few of their daughters, took the lead. And the eyes of the audience were not on the young girls but on their mothers whose graceful motions denotes years of practise.

But as the dance continued hour after hour, men, children, and more young women joined. The men with towels around their heads and mask-like faces, froliced gaily. They brought humor to the dance and by their presence seemed to lighten the hearts and steps of the others. Laughter was as dominant as the familiar songs the dancers sung and the Bon-odori swept on to a joyous, exciting climax.

Little girls, like their older sisters, were crowned in their best kimono. The children formed the inside ring, nearest the music, while their elders danced in the outer circle.

To the foreigners watching the dance seemed much like the folk dances and particularly the May pole dance of Europe. The "music box" in the center could well have been a May pole around which the dancers circled and towards which they stepped at times. But distinctive of the Bon-odori dancers were the ancient songs they sang and the chants they merrily repeated.

About the temple-yard were hung red, green, and yellow lanterns effectively illuminating the ceremony against the midnight blue sky. Spectators came and left but the Bon-odori continued.

The annual bazaar for the benefit of the Japanese kindergarten will be held at 9 a.m. Saturday at the Japanese church and kindergarten opposite the Mikasa store.

The bazaar is always one of the most important events of the summer, for merchants, summer residents, and year-around residents take a united interest in it. Families come and spend the day, making the affair a social as well as a benevolent activity. Merchants contribute wares as varied as their stocks are, which every visitor in Karuizawa agrees is about as wide a range as anyone can imagine.

Foodstuffs are contributed by the merchants and bought by the residents as their Saturday night supper or Sunday dinner. Each year from 350 to 400 yen is made for the kindergarten.

The Japanese kindergarten has existed here for 20 years. Started originally as a summer kindergarton, there was so much interest shown in it by the year-around residents that it was continued as a 10-month school. The long vacation comes not in the summer but in the winter, during January and February.

The committee in charge of the bazaar consists of Rev. M. Akama, pastor of the Japanese church, Dr. Daniel Norman, Dr. S. M. Erickson, H. V. Nicholson, E. Dozier, and Miss J. C. Gillespy.

The bazaar will begin with a procession through the Machi, as it did last year. Just who will march or ride in the parade is not yet decided but many are expected to join it, on bicycle, horse or foot.

Governors Not In Accord On Administration

Ely Says New Deal Imperils Individualism; McNutt Commends Program

New Deal policies today split the harmony meeting of the annual Governors' Conference in session at Machinac land, Mich. recently states an article in the New York Times.

Governor Joseph B. Ely of Massachusetts demanded a return of American industry to rugged individualism, and Governor Paul V. McNutt of Indiana, disagreeing with him, urged cooperation of all States in the enforcement of codes established under the NRA. Both Mr. Ely and Mr. McNutt are Democrats.

Governor Ely warned that the NRA program wuld "end in a Socialistic State," if carried to its ultimate conclusion. Mr. McNutt, with only praise for the Recovery Act, asked his fellow Governors:

"Aren't conditions better? Are we not on the way back? And have we not succeeded in priming the pump?"

Governor Ely said that he was certain the Eastern States wanted no State enforcement legislation. When Mr. Ely apologized for his "old-fashioned viewpoint," Governor Wilbur L. Cross of Connecticut interjected a statement that he was old fashioned too.

McNutt Asks Cooperation

Mr. McNutt said the States could cooperate in the recovery program without special legislation by coordinating their conservation, relief and agricultural stabilization activities with those of the Federal Government.

Mr. Ely conceded merit to the NRA "as a temporary emergency measure," but declared he could not "conceive the government of the United States permanently enduring under the NRA and remaining the government of the United States that we have known and loved."

"There is no stopping short of the end of the road," he asserted, "and at the end of the road we shall have a socialistic state."

The great defect of the NRA, he said, was that "it ignores the diversity of hopes, ambitions, jealousies and dispositions of our people." While the public was made docile by the existence of a great emergency, such legislation was tolerable, he said, but the end of the emergency "may see our government altered in a way few of us would desire."

Opposes Business Dictator

The rule of American industry by "an industrial dictator," Mr. Ely declared, "is contrary to the principles which have made the United States the happiest and most prosperous nation on earth."

Mr. Ely said he feared that domination resulting from New Deal paternalism would increase over a people "made happy, contented and prosperous by the rugged individualism of the past."

He declared that in Italy under Mussolini, Germany under Hitler and Russia under Stalin, individualism has passed from the people to dictators and the people had become "children of government."

"Is that the sort of government we want?" Mr. Ely asked. "You may want it. But my desire is to stick as closely as possible to the government that made us happy and contented."

He urged that the good points of the NRA might be made a permanent part to "guide American business," and said that such features as child labor elimination and the right to collective bargaining would serve as beacons for business without the danger of a sudden change in codes by the edict of an industrial dictator.

Sees Home Forgotten

"In these times," he said, "we have come to think of government as the sole preserver of our liberties and our civilization. I'm afraid we have forgotten the home and the church."

Mr. Ely expressed adherence to Grover Cleveland's theory that the government "should lay out the course and establish the lighthouses, but not attempt to steer every vessel."

Taking up Governor McNutt's statement that the public works program had "primed the pump of industry," he warned that in "priming a pump" care should be taken not to exhaust the supply of priming before water comes from the pump.

"The race at the present time," he said, "is a race between the business of the United States and credit of the United States."

Mr. Ely disclaimed any intention of criticizing "our great President," explaining that Mr. Roosevelt had shown no disposition to make the NRA a permanent reature of government.

Choate Attack Answered

The attack made Thursday by Joseph H. Choate Jr., chairman of the Federal Alcohol Control Administration, on the State monopoly system of liquor control was answered by Frank A. Picard, chairman of the Michigan Liquor Control Commission.

Mr. Choate declared that a State liquor store system, if it was to combat the bootlegger effectively, must involve an impracticable number of stores, and a "huge army" of State employes. This army of employes, he said, would not only constitute a formidable political machine, but also be subject to graft and corruption.

Mr. Picard voiced a strenuous disagreement with Mr. Choate's beliefs, and said that if there was one danger to be faced, it was the danger that insidious propaganda from the wine and liquor industries and the big wholesalers would prevent the State monopoly system from being effective.

Relief Warning is Given

Aubrey Williams, Assistant Administrator of Federal Relief, said that the CWA was the best answer to tre problem of unemployment, and appealed to the Governors to put their States into line to share the cost of general jobless relief.

"We are becoming complacent about the fact that one-sixth of our entire population is living in a state of chronic destitution. Regular work and wages are the only answer, and this has got to come this Winter. People will not stand for another Winter of direct relief. The Federal Government feels responsible for seeing that funds are properly administered after they reach the State."

Asked how long the States could anticipate the need for relief, Mr. Williams said:

"Probably one more year. Much depends upon the fluctuations of employment in industry. Congress will have to appropriate more relief funds and the drought has reached a stage where 64 per cent of the nation's farm lands are seriously affected."

of the group known as the Solidarite Francaise, M. Renaud declared his belief in the necessity of a Franco-German understanding which will facilitate the "fight against Bolshevism". Indeed, M. Renaud finds virtue in such an understanding, mainly because it would "bind the strong powers together against revolutionary elements and political opportunists".

Fighting units in Solidarite Francaise—known as "Blue Shirts"—consist of 1500 young people wearing blue shirts, grey flannel trousers and blue berets. Their badge is a red cock. Vancouver Has Reached Cross-Roads In Rise

Pacific Coast Port's Progress Of Vital Importance To Canada

The story of Vancouver's rise as a grain port to her present important position is not only one of great endeavour and spectacular achievement, but also a fact which is of vital national importance to Canada. This fact, moreover, is but barely perceived even on the Pacific Coast and probably is too often entirely overlooked by the rest of Canada. Some explanation of the cross-roads at which Vancouver has arrived and the possible National consequence of a continuance or a decline in the volume of grain shipped westward through the Pacific Coast outlet, is of particular interest at this time, writes Robert McKee, managing director of the Canada Grain Export Co., Ltd., in "Canadian Business."

The Genesis of the grain export trade of Vancouver has been chronicled so often that the story is widely known. There is one fact, however, which will bear emphasis, namely that the germ from which our new great trade in export grain sprang, was the construction in 1914 of the first elevator, capable of holding 1¼ million bushels and built by the Dominion Government. It is an interesting fact that the conception of this elevator, or at any rate its location at Vancouver, was very largely due to the foresight and energy of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is very doubtful, however, if even the Minister foresaw the importance of the policy which he then initiated.

There is some degree of misconception in Eastern Canada as to the nature of the export grain trade of Vancouver. Because of its location on the Pacific Coast there seems to be an impression that Vancouver is only the "Gateway to the Orient" so far as grain exports are concerned. This of course is not so, although it is quite correct that all Canada's exports of grain to the Orient must pass through Vancouver. Shipments to China and Japan form but a small proportion of total forwardings. Our principal markets are those of Europe, with Great Britain outstandingly the most important. The Panama Canal has brought Liverpool as near, speaking financially, not geographically, to Vancouver as it is to Montreal; in other words, a bushel of grain can be shipped from Central Alberta at the same cost via Vancouver as over the Montreal or New York routes. It is this fact which has enabled Vancouver to build up in the course of a few years, a trade which now embodies practically one half of Canada's total exports of wheat.

Beneficial Diversion

Without adequate explanation it might be thought that this diversion of wheat exports through Vancouver has deprived Montreal and other Canadian ports on the Atlantic Seaboard of trade which they formerly possessed. This, definitely, is not true and it is a source of considerable satisfaction to Vancouver that it is not so. Canada as a whole would have gained little if trade were lost to Montreal and given to Vancouver. However, the fact is that Montreal and the other Canadian Eastern ports handle the same or a greater proportion of Canadian wheat exports as they did before Vancouver was in the grain business. For instance, Eastern ports carried 33 per cent in 1922, 27 per cent, in 1923, 37 per cent, in 1932 and 45 per cent in 1933. Over the same period the shipment of Canadian wheat through New York and other United States Atlantic ports has declined, and this decline has been in almost exact proportion to Vancouver's growth. In other words, the wheat export trade of Vancouver has diverted shipments which otherwise would have taken place through United States Atlantic Coast ports and has not disturbed the business handled by similar Canadian ports.

In 1921, when Vancouver commenced to ship wheat, 6 per cent. of Canada's exports went through Vancouver, 67 per cent. through New York and other United States ports and 26 per cent. through Montreal and other Eastern Canada ports. In 1931, ten years later 44 per cent. went throuh Vancouver, 37 per cent. through Eastern Canada ports and only 19 per cent. through United States ports.

It is impracticable to discuss all the factors which have entered into this transfer of a trade amounting to three million tons of grain in a favourable year. In fact it is not necessary to do so, the fact speaks for itself as one of national importance. It is obviously of importance and value to Vancouver to have acquired in the short space of ten years a maritime trade which many ports have taken many decades to build up. That, however, is a local aspect of the case, whereas for the moment we are concerned with the national aspect.

Grain Aids All Trade

Western Canada produces a great quantity of varied products of the soil, the sea, the forest and the mine; so great a quantity, indeed, that only a comparatively small part of the product can be consumed within Canada. The surplus must be sold abroad, and it is safe to say that if Canada's export markets were cut off, the population of Western Canada would rapidly dwindle and her cities, towns and farms fall waste. This statement will be no surprise to most readers, and may be taken as axiomatic.

Thus it is a matter of prime importance that Canada shall have ready access to export markets. Before the advent of the export grain traffic, there was no such ready access from the Pacific Coast of Canada. Lumber exporters were importuning the Government to provide ships to carry their lumber to foreign markets. The Government Merchant Marine was built at high cost and run at heavy loss; subsidies were given to private steamship owners to operate vessels so that the products of the West could move to export markets. With the growth of the grain traffic the picture has changed. Nowadays there are plenty of ships and there are regular services to all parts of Europe, South America, Australia, and New Zealand, South Africa, West Indies and the Orient. Why is this? The answer is not far to seek. It is in two parts. The first is that the availability at all times of grain as cargo has enabled line companies to establish regular sailings with the assurance that they can always rely on securing enough grain at Vancouver to fill space in their ships otherwise unoccupied. The second reason is that much of the cargo from Western Canada is "bulk" cargo, such as lumber, taking a low freight rate, and requiring tramp ships for its transport in large quantities to the various and varying markets.

Trampers

A large proportion of the tramps which load grain at Vancouver also load lumber, and other local products. Were it not for the availability of grain, the export lumber trade would be in a sorry state today, instead of growing yearly. As regards the general cargo trade, suffice it to point out that in every line of export, Vancouver's shipments have greatly increased during the past ten years and new lines of export are being constantly added.

This has been made possible by the existence of regular lines to all parts of the world, and the regular lines have been made possible by the availability of the wheat. In 1920, 336 deep sea ships left the port of Vancouver; in 1930, this was 1,157, practically a threefold growth in the ten years since grain started to move.

Unquestionably grain has built up Vancouver's shipping trade. Exports of flour, lumber, fish products, fertilizers, metals and manufactures have been built up coincidentally, using grain as the "back-log."

Therefore, the existence of Vancouver as a grain port is a matter of National importance, for were our grain exports suddenly to be cut off there would be a sad falling off in our exports of lumber and other commodities as well, because of the lack of ships in which to carry them.

Japanese Trade Increase Is Held Due to Efficiency

was not in common use at all. The 1929 edition of Saito's Japanese English Dictionary (4,340 pages) does not contain that word. The hard times of 1929-32 following upon the raising of the gold embargo accelerated the process of the Rationalization as remarked by Mr. Sansom (see below for quotation).

"The time has not come yet to make a profit and loss account of the Rationalization in Japan. But the secret of Japan's recent commercial expansion abroad cannot be known if this outstanding fact is overlooked, namely, that whereas the manufacturer in some other countries did nothing but grumble about the hard times with folded arms, Japanese manufacturer boldly headed for rationalization, and has managed, at a price of course, to attain some measure of success.

For a brief description of the Rationalization of Japanese industry in 1932, the words of an impartial third party may be borrowed. Writing under the heading of "Rationalization," Mr. Sansom, British Commercial Counsellor in Tokyo says in his official report that (6):

"The leading feature of industry in Japan during the period under review is its progressive 'rationalization.' In most of the important manufactures there was a serious and on the whole successful effort to improve organization and technique, to economise labor and to reduce costs..."

"That rationalization has been more than a popular phrase is patent to any one who has spent the last few years in Japan. The quality and the variety of Japanese manufactures have improved at a remarkable rate. The development was doubless not so sudden as it appears, since the national energies have been devoted to this end for long past, and there has now grown up a generation equipped with the necessary knowledge and skill, which is able to profit by the experience—both the achievements and the mistakes—of other industrial countries."

"But the hard times of 1930 seem to have accelerated the progress, with the result that today in many fields the Japanese manufacturer produces a better article than ever, and at a less cost. By the second half of 1932 Japanese goods in great variety were flooding markets all over the world; and, though the fall in the exchange value of the yen was in many cases the chief reason for this success, its underlying cause is increased efficiency."

"For long past those aggrieved by Japanese competition have been apt to console themselves with the thought that the Japanese are lacking in mechanical skill and tradition, and that consequently their workpeople could not hope to reach the standard of older industrial countries. This might have been true several decades ago, when in most households in this country a screwdriver or a spanner were unfamiliar instruments; but today small boys make wireless sets and are interested in any kind of mechanism; and even if most modern factory processes demanded more than the ability to repeat one simple operation they would present no serious difficulties to a deft-fingered people who have been unrivalled craftsmen for centuries."

"It is not lack of adaptability on the part of her workers which will set limits to the industrial expansion of Japan; and, as for the leaders of industry, if one may judge by results, Japanese directors, managers and technicians are not wanting in skill and enterprise. If they are deficient in such respects, their faults will not stay uncorrected for want of energy and determination."

(2) INCREASE OF EFFICIENCY AND REDUCTION OF COSTS

(A) General Outlook

The following table prepared by the Social Bureau of the Department of Home Affairs tells the story of increased efficiency in Japanese manufacturing industry during the recent years. Such increase in productive efficiency was made possible by the improvement of both machines and labour. It resulted in a corresponding decrease in the cost of production.

(B) Cotton Spinning and Weaving

In June 1929, it required 61.2 male and 218.9 female operatives to work ten thousand spindles for one day in Japanese cotton spinning establishments. The wages amounted to ¥362.93. As the Rationalization progressed, the number of operatives was reduced in December 1932 to 31.9 male (52 per cent) and 164.1 female (75 per cent) workers. The wages paid decreased to 48 per cent or ¥174.29.

The following table furnishes much food for thought(7):—

A Chart Showing Industrial Production and Employment Indexes in Japan, 1930-1934. (Basis: 1930=100)

Sources: Production Index: Mitsubishi Economic Research Bureau, Monthly Circular No. 127, May, 1934. Weighted index of 26 articles. Basis: 1930=100. Employment Index: The Bank of Japan, Statistics of Factory Labour, the original base year is 1926, from which the figures here represented were converted to the basis of 1930=100.

As labor costs occupy about a half of the cost of production in the Japanese cotton spinning and weaving industries,(9) this economy in labor costs is bound to affect the cost of production. It may be deduced from the preceding table that this reduction was achieved not so much by pressure upon wages as by the saving of labor in consequence of improvement in equipment and machinery. Thus if the average daily wage per operative in June 1929 (¥1.29) is taken as 100, that for December 1932 stood at 81, whereas the aggregate wages dwindled to 48. As a further illustration of this point, the labor saved in various processes of cotton spinning in a certain mill is briefly described below.

1. In the mixing section equipment was very much simplified so that the raw cotton fed into the machine comes out automatically without any trouble. Formerly several hands attended to this machine. One operative looks after it now.

2. In the blowing section, one process has been dispensed with. Two processes only are required now. (One process only where there were formerly two.)

3. In the coarse roving section, one process has been eliminated by the use of the Japanese made Simplex fly frames. The costs of labor and motive power thus saved amount to one yen per bale. It used to take four processes in fine counts and three in middle and grosser counts. The present concern of the Japanese cotton spinner is to reduce them to two in the former and to only one in the latter. As a matter of fact, some factories are already spinning middle and grosser counts in only one process in the coarse roving section.

4. In the fine roving section, productive efficiency has been increased by the employment of the high drought system. The usual equipment and the Simplex and the high drought systems compare as follows in a factory having 30,000 spindles spinning 20 counts(10):

	A.	B.	C.
No. of machines required	234	252	240
No. of operatives required	258	156	143

Note:—
A.—Usual Equipment.
B.—High Drought only.
C.—Simplex and High Drought.

These result in the following decrease in the cost of production (per bale):

Cost of producing one bale of 20's	¥25	¥22	¥20

This curtailment is made possible by the economy achieved in labor, motive power, articles of consumption, repairs, overhead charges and so on.

5. Increasing by 15 percent the thread length of one cop. It used to require six operatives. Two girls can manage it now.

6. One process has been done away with by the elimination of the winder. Warping is now done direct from the Cheese bobbin.

7. Improvement of the warping creel.

8. Use of the Japanese made reaching-in-machine. Whereas formerly two operatives could attend to five only, now one operative is sufficient for the same amount of work.

9. Use of the automatic looms.

10. Use of auto-cloth guider.

11. Labor costs reduced by 50 sen per bale by discontinuing the practice of reeling from the cop.

To take the case of a certain mill near Nagoya, the sum total of these all-round improvements is that whereas the index of efficiency is 115 if the year 1926 is taken as the basis, the index of workers employed becomes 45, so that the per head productive efficiency of the workers increased 255 per cent during the last few years. It is noteworthy that the per head earnings of operatives is on the increase. According to the figures obtained in a certain factory, in April 1934, the number of workers employed decreased 17.8 per cent compared with the year 1933. The number of the machines worked increased, on the contrary, 1.3 per cent in the spinning department and 4.3 per cent in the weaving department, which was accompanied by the increase of production of 8.9 per cent in the spinning and 29.9 per cent in the weaving departments The average daily earnings of the workers (male and female) increased from 77.6 sen in 1933 to 82 sen in April 1934.

The Japanese cotton mill owner is able to devote his attention to the Rationalization for two reasons. One is that he put a considerable part of his profits during the boom period into reserve and consequently he has abundant funds at his disposal for improvements. The other is that no objection is forthcoming from labour against the elimination of irrational processes in manufacturing or the instalment of more efficient machines. When the author was shown round a certain cotton spinning mill in May 1934, he saw many motors in excellent conditions lying about in the yards of the factory. In answer to his question, the chief engineer explained that these expensive Swiss motors were rather too fine for a cotton mill. In the fine roving section, he said, the customary group driven motors were being replaced with individual motors by the use of the Japanese made two speed motors. According to the chief engineer, the motive power thus saved amounts to 50 kilowatt per bale, and the shaft loss decreases 15 per cent on account of the discontinuance of the main shaft. Moreover, whereas it used to require an area of 2,000 tsubo for the accommodation of 30,000 spindles under the old equipment, the same space now can contain 47,000 spindles.

The Japanese cotton industry has thus come to occupy a superior position to that of other countries. For the information of the readers, a rough comparison with the English cotton industry is given below(11):—

	Japanese	English
No. of Spindles	8 million.	50 million (1/3 of the total spindles of the world)
Raw cotton consumed	2,760,000 bales	2,250,000 bales(12)
Equipment	Mule, 4%; Ring 96%.	Mule, 76%; Ring, 24%.
Looms	300,000, a half of which are automatic.	650,000 of which only 30,000 are automatic.
Organization	A Japanese cotton mill is usually engaged not only in spinning, but also in weaving, finishing and so on. The recent tendency is that the same mill undertakes silk spinning, artificial silk manufacture, wool spinning, staple fibre making, etc.	A perfect division of labour is in force in England. Spinning, weaving, finishing, printing, are all carried on by separate establishments. Even packing constitutes a separate business. Not only in manufacturing, but also in the collection and distribution of manufactured goods, the law of the division of labour is strictly applied.
	No middleman exists to receive commission.	Commission paid to middle-men is said to amount to 10%.
Unit of enterprise	71 establishments. Capital per house is 7,039,000 yen.	207 establishments. Capital per house is 2,550,000 yen.
	Have abundant reserve funds.	Much expansion was carried out by loans during the boom period of 1919-20. Many are hard pressed to pay rather a high rate of interest.
Control	The Japan Cotton Spinners' Association has a strong power of control.	The English counterpart of the Japan Cotton Spinners' Association has only a nominal power of control over its members.
Labour	Male operatives, 15%. The rest are girls who work to save marriage dowry or to support their parents. Labour is continuously being replaced by girls fresh from the country.	Male operatives, 35%. There are many workers whose parents were mill hands. Higher percentage of workers who are advanced in age and pay.
	Looms per head; ordinary looms—8; automatic, 30-40.	Looms per head is 6. Used to be 4. The trade union objects to the installation of automatic looms.

Outline of Dr. Kojima's Study

Professor Masataro Kojima, Doctor of Economics, of Kyoto Imperial University, has been for some time engaged in the study of the Japanese textile industry, with an especial emphasis on the management side of the cotton spinning and weaving branches. His first report appears in the March 1934 number of the Monthly Report of the Japan Cotton Spinners' Association under the title of "Movement of Mechanical and Labour Efficiency in the Japanese Cotton Spinning industry."(13) This study takes the year 1913 as the basis of comparison, and is full of useful observations from various angles. But it would be rather unsuited to those who want to take the slump year 1929 in the valuation of the Rationalization. Nevertheless, it is an indispensable material to those who are interested in the question of the efficiency of the cotton industry. Outstanding features of this report are summarised below for the benefit of those who cannot read Japanese

The Japanese cotton spinning industry has been able to produce finer counts of yarns without increasing the fly of raw cotton (about 15 per cent). In 1913, grosser counts occupied 30.6 per cent, middle counts, 8.9 per cent; and fine counts, 0.5 per cent. In 1932, the percentage changed to; grosser counts, 59.8 per cent, middle, 31.1 per cent; fine, 1.6 per cent. These figures would show that mechanical efficiency in the spinning section of the industry is encouraging on the whole.

Whereas the hours worked indicate an increase of 30 per cent, the output of yarns rose by 80 per cent. This fact alone would explain how mechanical and labour efficiency was heightened.

In the weaving section, very remarkable progress was made in mechanical efficiency. If the recent three years are compared with the initial three years (from 1913), the wastage of yarns decreased to one-third (0.87 per cent in 1932). The fundamental cause for this may be ascribed to the adoption of Japanese automatic looms. Before and during the Great War, looms used by Japanese companies had all been imported. Stimulated by the stoppage of supply on account of the War, Japanese invented looms began to appear one after another. Besides the Toyoda automatic loom, there came out Tada, Iwanaga, Kimoto, Igeta, Nakamura and Senshu systems. The Toyoda automatic loom is considered to be the world's best. The English firm of Platt Brothers used to supply more than a half of the looms in Japan. It now bought Toyoda's patent in order to sell Japanese looms in England. In the weaving section, the output went up 450 percent with an increase of 60 percent only in labour. By way of foot note, the author would like to add that the Toyoda Automatic Loom Manufacturing Company cannot accept orders now unless they are placed 18 months ahead.

(C) Coal Mining

In coal mining industry, per head production increased 45 percent to 218 tons in 1932 from 150 tons in 1929. Up to 1930, no legal restrictions had been placed on the working hours in the coal mining industry. In that year, the maximum hours were fixed at 10 in the pit The hours are computed from the time when a miner enters the pit to the time when he comes out of it, and include the time for breaking and that required for going to and from the actual place of work. The net working hours vary according to mines, but the average is said to range from 5 to 7 hours.

Thus the Japanese miner has been able to produce 45 percent more in less hours of work. Combined with other factors, such increase of efficiency on his part enabled his employer to reduce the cost of production by 60 percent during the past three years. The miner has consequently been rewarded by an increase in his wages. The index number of his wages for 1931 was 83. It stood at 91 in November, 1933. In December, 1934, it went up to 92, at which it stayed in January and February, 1934.(14)

(D) Artificial Silk

In 1933 Japan became the second largest rayon producer in the world, with an output of 80 million pounds. The Japanese artificial silk industry is only ten years old. But during this brief period it has been able to add 100 million yen in value to the annual industrial produce of the Japanese Empire and absorb 30,000 workers in its factories. Such a new record has not been realised without untiring efforts on the part of the manufacturers. They reserved 60-70 percent of their profits for further improvement of technique, and have been able to cut down the cost of production by more than 40 per cent in the course of three years.(15) The figures obtained by the courtesy of the Bank of Japan indicates that kakohi or the cost of production excluding the cost of materials in the artificial silk industry decreased to 63 at the end of 1931 when Japan went off gold (Base; first half of 1929=100). In March, 1934, the index number was brought down to 43.

It must be noted here again that in the rayon industry, too, the reduction of costs is more due to improvement of technique and rationalization than to pressure upon wages. This is testified to by a comparison of the wage index in the rayon industry with the index of the cost of production. The index of nominal wages in March 1934 is 89 (first half of 1929 taken as the basis),(16) whereas the index of the cost of production is 43 as stated above. In discussing wages, however, one should not overlook the fact that while the nominal wage index for November 1933 was 94.6, the real wage index increased to 119 (1929 as 100.).

(E) Railway Work Shops

Steam locomotives used on Japanese railways are thoroughly overhauled every three years. 17 years ago, a complete overhaul used to take 30 days on an average. Nowadays the same work is being accomplished in five days.(17)

The most remarkable thing about it is that the work is done without increasing the number of workers. On the contrary, the labor required for this work has been reduced from 900 man days to less than 400 man days. Even America's mechanical skill is not able to perform a similar work in less than 14 days, while in England and Germany, it is said to take four weeks. Soviet Russia sent a staff of railway engineers to the Omiya Works of the Department of Railways for the completion of the Five Year Plan. After a few months stay at the town of Omiya, they returned to Russia, and, by copying the Japanese method, they were able to shorten by half the number of days necessary for a complete overhaul of a locomotive which used to take 45 days formerly. They could not proceed further, however. Being desirous of attaining the Japanese standard, the Government of the U.S.S.R. approached the Japanese authorities with a view to obtaining the personal assistance of the engineer-in-chief of the Omiya Works. Consequently, Chief Engineer Kato of the Omiya Works was despatched to Soviet Russia with a staff of assistants. Under the personal direction of Engineer Kato, the time was shortened to 7 days. But when the Japanese technicians left Russia, the Russians could not keep up this record. According to the latest information, 11 days are required now in Soviet Russia to overhaul a steam locomotive.

Sword Has Played Important Part In Life Of People Here

By CAPT. K. TAKETOMI I.J.N.

This sword, made by the master sword-smith Yoshifusa 724 years ago (A.D. 1210), was presented by the then-Crown Prince (later Emperor Taisho), to Admiral Togo at the time of the Russo-Japanese War. It was the Admiral's favorite sword, and was worn by him on the flagship "Mikasa" during the battle of the Japan Sea.

Why is the Japanese sword, or Nipponto as it is called in the Japanese language, so highly valued? A superficial observer may simply say, "Why, because it cuts well." But that does not answer this significant question. Many of you have no doubt had occasion to experience a mysterious and overpowering sensation thrill through your veins on gazing at the bright shining blade of a Japanese sword. Whence comes this sensation? That is the subject of my discussion.

As a Japanese as well as a naval officer, I love the Japanese sword I adore its transcendent virtues.

The significance of the Japanese sword is two fold.

In the first place, it serves as a means of self-mastery.

In the second place, it is an instrument for the subjugation of evil

These two ought never to be confused

As for the first point, it may be said that the Japanese wears his sword as an earnest of good faith in speech and conduct. In making a promise it used to be the custom of the samurai to draw his sword slightly and sheath it back with a clang, thereby calling Heaven to witness. As a matter of fact, many a warrior in the ancient days, many a soldier or sailor in modern times, committed suicide by falling on his own sword as an act of apology for his failure to keep his word.

Sacred was his pledge, and how sublime his manner of self-punishment!

The Bushido had its birth in the significance of the Japanese sword as a means of self-mastery, which admits of no falsehood or dishonor. And this noble spirit of our race has come down to us from time immemorial, and will suffer no change through ages to come.

It is by self-mastery that one may attain the untrammeled and boundless world of true freedom and true equality, or of enlightenment itself.

Now when there is anyone wicked enough to injure another, or work harm in the world, then, and not till then, will the Japanese sword assume its second role as a remover of injustice and inequity. And how well it cuts—this peerless sword of Japan!

The Japanese sword of the mythological age and of the early historical era is represented as having a blade that was straight and double-edged, implying, so to speak, that it was intended to operate both ways—to cut its wearer as well as to smite his opponent.

Many centuries ago our ancestors invented an ideal method of producing iron. They also discovered the means of obtaining various kinds of steel. The superiority of the Japanese race is well proved by this single fact that it succeeded so long ago in an industry which modern science finds it difficult to perfect.

The Japanese sword has an absolute advantage over any other in the world in that its blade does neither break nor bend, but cuts exceedingly well. Moreover, it has an appearance that is superb. The Japanese was not content only with the practical merits of his blade, but made it so as to satisfy his aesthetic taste. It is this combination of beauty and practicality that constitute the characteristic excellence of the Japanese sword.

An Old Japanese sword is a genuine piece of art, which was created by the sword-smith in an inspired state of body and mind. It has nothing in common with any modern industrial article, manufactured for gain in a limited time and by sparing as much labor as possible. No product of our machine age can ever claim to possess the qualities of a masterpiece.

The Japanese sword-smith of old addressed himself to his work in all piety. He decorated his smithy with the sacred rice-straw rope called "shimenawa," went through the rituals of purification and ablution, and prayed to the gods for immunity from evil thoughts and influence. In this sanctified spirit and atmosphere did he manipulate the native properties of iron, fire and water in order to call into existence the splendid blade that we all adore.

After all, the Japanese sword, thus brought into being at the climax of the perfect and harmonious operation of the elements—iron fire and water—is an object of art of the highest rank, that completely satisfies the artistic conscience of our race. On inspecting a genuine old blade all of us are always fascinated, and experience an inexplicable sensation of pleasure. This is a natural feeling that has its root in a long history of three thousand years.

Before a Japanese sword, regardless of whether it be a short blade of less than one foot, or a long one of over two feet, we feel invariably the presence of something replete with cosmic sublimity.

The Japanese sword is no lethal weapon, but the guardian of justice and righteousness.

The quality of steel is determined by the impartation of proper quantity of carbon, which is a most difficult process requiring utmost precision in firing and tempering. It is extremely hard even for modern science to gauge accurately the limit to which carbon is absorbed and beyond which it is emitted, but a master smith of old Japan sensed that limit and made no mistake. And in putting on the edge to the blade, he not only knew exactly the required amount of firing and watering, but was able to produce various substances such as are known today as martensite, troopstite, sorbite, and pearlite, which in the process of their formation were made to leave on the surface of the blade the so-called "blade figures" of indescribable beauty—the pride of the Japanese sword.

There are dozens of stages the Japanese sword must pass before its completion. It is a marvellous fact that a blade after having undergone dozens of times a similar process of tempering administered with fire, water and a hammer, contains in it precious varieties of steel, both soft and hard. It is their presence that gives the Japanese sword its characteristic toughness, and its strength to resist the shock of any powerful stroke without either bending or breaking, and accounts at the same time for the various surface patterns such as "nioi," "nie", "kinsuji", or "jifu" which are brought forth through the process of firing the edge. Its body pure and clear as the autumn water, its star-spangled "nie" resembling the Milky Way and its blade-figures, formed of exquisite curved lines of every imaginable kind, make the Japanese sword a thing of ravishing beauty.

In fine, the sharpness of the Japanese sword depends upon the creative workmanship of the master sword-smith, who devotes himself, heart and soul, to his task with the wariness of a man riding a swift and spirited horse along a precipice, because a single slip at any turn of the elaborate process spells ruin.

The accessories of the Japanese sword, consisting of the "saya" (scabbard) "tsuka" (hilt), "tsuba" (sword-guard), "kojiri" (crampit), "menuki" (hilt ornament), etc., all artistically wrought and excellently adapted to practical use, have no equal in the world in point of craftsmanship and originality. The motif of their designs, or decorations, is taken usually from birds and flowers, which imparts to the Japanese sword the manifold charms of Nature. In them are depicted abundant life and all things that grow. This fact alone is sufficient to show that the Japanese sword is not intended to be a murderous weapon, but that its real mission is to guard and foster life.

The true worth of the Japanese sword is revealed when it accomplishes its end without being drawn from the scabbard. Hence the phase: "Exploits of the sheathed sword." The uses of the Japanese sword may be compared to the armament of a country, which serves to prevent war, and which is actually employed only rarely and for the purpose of self-defense.

In Japan the word "military valor" means the courage to "stay the spear," or the non-use of arm, which is the manifestation of true heroism. Physical prowess alone is of little use in this respect, unless it is coupled with virtue. In the last analysis, true valor is virtue.

London Homeless Now Number 3071; Increases Slightly

County Council Is Opposed To Habit Of Jobless To Sleep Outdoors

LONDON, July 10.—One fine, clear night recently, when there was a moderate temperature, twenty-six officials sent out by the London County Council Public Assistance Committee took a census of homeless persons in the administrative county of London.

They found 3,071, as against 2,948 in a 1933 census. These did not include persons who had paid for beds in lodging houses. There were 2,795 men, 266 women, and 10 children. The officials covered 120 miles of streets.

In a commentary on the census the committee states that, despite a steady decline since 1931 in the number of persons using lodging houses and casual wards, there was an increase in the number using voluntary societies' homes and shelters. During the past decade, however, there had been little change in the numbers of homeless and destitute found in the streets, along the Embankment and under arches.

It is one of the curious anomalies of London that people going through the beautiful tree-lined Mall see men and women huddled up on benches, scarcely a stone's throw from Buckingham Palace. They are not allowed to sleep, however—a "bobby" passes continually and prods gently any who doze off. Sleeping out in public in London is something that can be done only in broad daylight, on the grass in one of the many parks.

Council Is Against It

The London County Council is against this habit of sleeping out, declaring that it is absolutely unnecessary, as any destitute persons can obtain food and shelter at many places in the city, and notices are displayed in public places telling just where the homeless can find refuge.

The down-and-outs, however, are in revolt against this threat to their liberty, preferring discomfort and even hardship to the stigma of the charity of the workhouse or casual ward. They say they will sleep indoors when the authorities provide decent places for them, but that the present places are like prisons, or even worse.

The other night nearly eighty people were sleeping out in Trafalgar Square, and in one corner a woman and her husband were doing the week's washing, with shirts and underwear hung over the stone balustrades of the fountain to dry.

The Socialist majority on the London County Council, in discussing measures for achieving reform, holds that in the eyes of visitors the spectacle is a reflection on the richest city in the world and on their own "moral earnestness."

Ancient Custom Caused 'Humble Pie' Expression

One of the many phrases that came from the table into literature is that of "eating humble pie." When wild game was plentiful in Europe and a deer was killed the lord and his household dined upon the choicer cuts of meat, but the hunter and his friends were served with a meat pie made from the entrails, the heart, the liver, and similar parts. These parts were called the umbles. Since that time an extra letter has been added to the "umble pie" but the meaning is not so different.

Social and Personal Notes

By CHIYO HIROSE

It was Friday and the 5:35 from Ueno was starting off to Karuizawa. Bridge foursomes fought over getting seats together, the lavatories and vestibules were full of golf bags and the aisles full of people, all more or less distracted.

I went up with John Allison the American vice-consul, who, being a seasoned commuter, fought his way ably through the crowd and got seats next to James Baeyens and Wilfrid Fleisher who were already casting around for a likely pair for bridge. All in all, we made a dignified enough departure, as Prince Fumimaro Konoye arrived three minutes before train time and was seen off by a few friends, the station master and all the akabo.

A little masterly bridge got underway then, the climax of which was Wilfrid's three-no-trump hand bid under the impression that he was partnering the opponents who had also no-trump. He made four, and thereby thoroughly won the complete admiration of Mr. Astrakhan who sat across the way, bound up in a suede jacket since he was trying to "sweat out a cold." The last hand being too much for me. I went over to talk to Mr. MacGregor who had just come back from Kobe from meeting his niece Miss Gilray Laidlow who was straight from Renfewshire, Scotland, and who is going to make a long visit with her aunt and uncle here. She is small, dark and pretty and should have a good time here.

All Eels Sold Out

Takasaki was more hectic than usual since all the eels were sold out and James created a little added excitement by taking off his shirt and dashing a basin of cold water over himself.

Inspite of everything however, we got in to Karuizawa on the minute, and were met by all the wives and trundled off to our various destinations.

Saturday included a picnic some place back of Asama and the dance at the New Grand Lodge that evening. Baroness Togo headed one long table of young people, including several of the delegates of the America Japan Student Conference tour, who will be her guests until Tuesday.

Dr. and Mrs. Juilliot de la Morandiere, Mrs. Tsuguharu Fujita who was spending the weekend with them, and Mr. Jean Chabas of the Maison Franco-Japonaise made another party. Madeleine always seems to get a lot of people around her wherever she goes and they were all very gay. The Morandieres are leaving Karuizawa Wednesday for Tokyo as they are going on September 4 to China and Chosen.

Krupka, the Czechoslovakian Charge d'Affaires, was host at another table, at which were seated Mrs. Nettel, Mrs. Kayaser from Shanghai, with Mr. Reusch the Norwegian Charge d'Affaires seated between them and dispensing great success his well known charm, Mr Antonin Raymond who had come out from the solitudes of Shin-Karuizawa long enough to dance with all the pretty ladies present, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Allison, he in an aura of hay fever and she in one of red organdy, Maj. Bodley who looked dazed and happy, (he has two books coming out at once, by the grace of God) and myself who had for once pencil and the back of an envelope and was as usual making my friends work for me.

I also saw the Jiro Shirasus and Peyregne who all spent the weekend with Baron and Baroness Baeyens, Miss Chieko Hara the young pianist who was confining herself strictly to dancing, and Mrs. John Goold, Ralph Stillman and Dick Aiken who arrived rather late in the evening and started in on champagne, a la Baeyens.

Only One More Dance

Now that there's only one more dance to go at the Lodge, the bands are rounding up nicely. The Hawaiian outfit, gracefully conducted by the young son of Baroness Togo, kept very decent rhythm, really. Also the lights kept going off—and on—at irregular intervals throughout the evening, much to the delight of the "younger set."

There were really simply dozens of other people milling around though Mrs Fabius, a certain journalist, with Mrs. Fabius, Mr. and Mrs. Ishizaki, Capt. Wenneker the German Naval Attache, Mr. and Mrs. Mulder, the young Makiyamas, (she was Yoshiko Miyakawa the singer before her marriage) Miss Yukika and Miss Shinaye Ozaki, Mr. Arishima, Mr. T. I. Kala the Finnish Attache, Mr. Watanabe, Miss Berson, Don Zoll who is deserting us for Sendai soon, Miss Naomi Munzenmeyer, my colleague, Miss Mary Logan, Mr. Delmer Brown, Mr. Hideo Kato who teaches Karuizawa how to speak Japanese, Mr. Amakata, Mr. Hayashi, Mr. and Mrs. Ralson, Mr. and Mrs. Chiba, (you remember their marriage last year which was "one of the social events of the session"), Mr. and Mrs. Clarke Kawakami, (they spent the weekend at Eastern House and he has come to Japan to learn Japanese and to work on Rengo, Mr. and Mrs. Kawasaki, Mr. and Mrs. Asabuki, Dr. and Mrs. Dunn of Shanghai, Mrs. Yasuda, Mr. and Mrs. Kildoyle, (she is the secretary of Mr. B. W. Fleisher), Miss Oya Nishimura, Mr. and Mrs. Tsuchiura, Mr. and Mrs. Newton Elgers, Lt. F. P. Munson, Lt. Ranson Fullinwider, Miss Martha Logan, Mr. Shiro Moriya, Mr. and Mrs. A. Volny of the Czechoslovakian Legation, and a lady in a zebra striped evening dress with red shoulder straps whose name I simply couldn't find out. We all agreed she was from Shanghai.

Sunday was spent in recuperating, more or less, and before I knew it I was galloping off for the 7:38 for Tokyo. Everything was crowded and confused and as usual plaintive complaints about railroads in general and this one in particular began to be bandied about. Dick Aikon and Ralph Stillman who had been spending the weekend with the Goolds took this train down too, as did John Sample who sat on my suit case to Takasaki, and Kentie Magge, the Swedish Secretary, who fought his way through the train laden with the inevitable umbrella, a suit case, the 'History of Lady Noggs," and a bundle of rhubarb. He says its 3 sen cheaper a stalk than the Tokyo rhubarb and has a much better flavor, so I suppose it's worth it.

At last the engine gave a whistle, and those in the train waved to those on the platform, and 7:38 pulled out on that hong hong trail to Ueno.

Austria Cannot Exist By Itself Says Huddleston

Nation Termed 'Paper State' Which Is Lacking In Real Economic Entity

Once more it seems proved beyond doubt that the little remnant of the former great Austrian Empire cannot live by itself, and that by its helplessness it may always provoke some incident which would put a match to the powder barrel of Central Europe, says Sisley Huddleston in an article in the Christian Science Monitor.

When the peacemakers had finished their work in 1919 they left a hopeless nation with merely a shadowy existence.

Since then there has been a long struggle for control of Austria. At present the issue put epigrammatically is whether Austria shall become the province of Germany or a colony of Italy. The news that Premier Mussolini has concentrated troops near the frontier of Brenner sufficiently shows the importance attached to the future of a country which has been the theater of such alarming events.

Though there is a desire on all sides to refrain from rash action, Italy, France, Great Britain, Czechoslovakia and the Little Entente in general are on the qui vive.

No Solution Near

Nor must it be supposed that if they are successful in preventing immediate developments of a grave character the Austrian problem is solved. It may be said to have just become acute. It cannot be solved by mere perpetuation of the status quo. Some drastic measures must be taken before very long or Austria will furnish the pretext and occasion for a European war.

The former ramshackle empire which embraced Austria and Hungary was broken up. The new nation of Czechoslovakia was carved out of it. Roumania and Jugoslavia were greatly increased at its expense. Italy, particularly, profited not only by territorial acquisitions but by complete reduction of the Germanic nation which had pressed menacingly on its borders.

While Hungary lost the larger part of its territory and is keenly conscious of its grievances, it nevertheless can manage to subsist independently. Austria cannot. The declaration of "Austrian independence" is a misnomer.

Mainly Vienna

Austria consists mainly of the huge capital of Vienna, which grew up on the assumption of the continued existence of a great nation. But now there is concentrated in it more than a fourth part of Austria.

It is impossible for such a badly constructed nation, with disproportionate head and a diminutive body, to find its own resource. Thus it is dependent in a vital sense on other powers.

This was plainly seen by the peacemakers, who, after wielding the sledge-hammer, endeavored to repair their mistake by half-heartedly and for a short period providing for a special economic regime in Central Europe. They recognized that if the old empire was a political monstrosity containing desperate and oppressed races it was nevertheless an economic masterpiece which was absolutely indispensable in the valley of the Danube.

Nationalism Rampant

Unhappily, the intense nationalism which manifested itself among the neighors of Austria quickly separated countries of Central Europe into a number of economic units which dammed the stream of international trade and largely produced the crisis from which the whole world suffers.

Political animosities increased as economic distress augmented and the heart of Europe was filled with violent jealousies, fears and suspicions.

Austria itself would reluctantly have joined Germany, with which it has national affinities. But this solution was prohibited by the treaties and subsequent protocols which it was compelled to sign whenever it received aid.

Fears Engendered

France was afraid of the Greater Germany which incorporated Austria. Italy regarded with apprehension extension of Germany to its frontiers. Czechoslovakia saw itself as a feeble promontory in a Germanic ocean. For something more than a year Premier Mussolini has been tacitly given the task of controlling Austria. This obviously puts him in direct antagonism to Chancellor Hitler.

Chancellor Dollfuss owed whatever authority he had—apart from his attractive personality—to Premier Mussolini's support and to the military strength of the Heimwehr.

Though there is a troubled situation in which it is impossible to define the respective numbers of Socialists and National Socialists, it is certain that the Dollfuss party, entitled the Christian Socialists, represented the minority. His successor, Prince von Starhemberg assisted by Major Fey, frankly models his policy on that of Fascism.

Thus this tragic little state of Austria—which in a certain sense exists only on paper—is being pulled in all directions by the interested powers.

Herr Hitler's prompt action suggests that Germany wishes to disclaim all responsibility for the organized assassination, and is anxious to preserve the peace. France is keeping calm. Preventive assemblage of Italian and Czechoslovakian troops will presumably not be found provocative. Yet disorders are almost bound in the present circumstances to be repeated, and it is unlikely that future Austrian Governments will be as anti-Hitler as was the Dollfuss Government.

It follows that unless the opportunity is soon taken not merely of appeasing but of reorganizing central Europe and of placing Austria in particular in conditions in which it can live without being the object of ambitions and apprehensions and without being a menace perpetual and grave to the peace of Europe, it will eventually by its very weakness take a terrible revenge on the European powers which have placed it in its present situation, by becoming the cause of a devastating war.

Prince Metternich said that if the old empire didn't exist it would have to be invented. If Europe wants peace it will have to invent a Danubian confederation.

Government By Force Cause Of Dolfuss' Death

Austria Now Danger Point Of European Continent, Says American Paper

Austria again has paid the tragic price which is the cost of government by force, says an editorial of the Christian Science Monitor as of July 26. The editorial follows:

"The slaying of Chancellor Dollfuss in Wednesday's strange National Socialist Putsch was a violent, short-breathed and sudden interlude. Yet the animosities and differences which flared into the open with the seven-hour siege of the Ballhausplatz have been clearly apparent during the troubled months of Austria's recent history.

"Rent by political dissension, chafing under the hand of a dictatorship daily growing more severe, straitjacketed by the external pressure of German and Italian efforts to dominate it, Austria had become one of the danger points of the Continent. Economic distress aided the counsels of radicalism and despair. Rivalries in the seats of the mighty contributed to governmental instability. Private armies placed gunfire above the efficacy of reason.

"Against these forces, powerful diplomatic influences have been arrayed. That the dangers of the Austrian situation have been well recognized is one of the most hopeful elements in the efforts to prevent deeper international complications. Amid irresponsible talk that the Viennese debacle has brought nearer the possibility of war, it is well to remember that every nation of Europe is alive to the danger as well as to the absolute necessity of preventing the situation of today from paralleling that of exactly twenty years ago.

Socialists Implicated

"Whatever the immediate responsibility or lack of responsibility of Hitlerite Germany for the unfortunate events in Austria, the National Socialist Party cannot divorce itself from ultimate implication. Violence in Vienna has been constantly stimulated, if not directed, from Munich. Unification of the German-speaking peoples of the two countries continued to be the goal of an impatient policy. And whether Herr Hitler could not, or would not, control the extremes of the Austrian branch of his party remains at the moment less than fully clear—complicated by the terrorist tactics employed by both sides.

"Italy, meanwhile, firm in its effort to maintain a hegemony over Vienna in the guise of protecting Austrian independence, appears ready to go to great lengths in continuing its support of the Fascists in Austria who have so far kept the Hitlerites at bay. It is problematical whether Mussolini's policy has in it the seeds of ultimate success, for the linguistic, cultural, historical and economic ties of Austria all draw it toward Germany.

"Thus the foreign aspects of the situation serve to enlarge the major divisions within Austria itself. Germany supplies the motive force for the Nazis, pointing out that the Dollfuss regime was not representative of national sentiment. Italy supplies funds, if not munitions, for the Fascist Heimwehr of Prince Ernst von Starhemberg. And arms from Czechoslovakia are reported to have equipped the private army of the Socialists which, but a few short months ago, was crushed by the artillery fire of Dollfuss's federal troops and the Heimwehr.

Prince von Starhemberg's "home defense force," originally representing but a small class of dispossessed landowners and impoverished gentry, formed but one leg on which the Dollfuss Government stood. The other was that of Major Emil Fey who, as Minister of Defense, controlled the army and police. Thus it was upon strength at arms that the little Chancellor's power rested. Having suppressed the once powerful Socialists upon his left, and having replied in kind to the terrorist tactics of the National Socialists on the right, it is problematical how much popular support remains in the so-called "Fatherland Front" which was formed around the nucleus of the Christian Social Party of which Chancellor Dollfuss was the leader.

"Herein lies the major problem, not only of the temporary government headed by Dr. Schuschnigg—opponent alike of Socialist and Nazi—but of any attempt to rationalize the administration of Austria. The problem of erecting an administration based on popular sanction is not simple. It is not to be solved by constitutional elaborations of a cor-

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

81 Years and Edible

The 81-year-old can of beef was found on a sled belonging to the ill-fated Arctic expedition of Sir John Franklin which perished in 1853. A rescue expedition located only one abandoned sledge on which an old can of beef was found and later preserved in Liverpool.

In 1934 the official city bacteriologist pronounced the beef in the can perfectly fresh and fit for human consumption.

Trick Shots

Joe Kirkwood, famous trick shot artist from Australia, has mastered many seemingly, impossible shots in golf, and many that no other golfer has duplicated. His demonstrations at many of the well-known country clubs all over the world are always tremendously interesting, but probably the most difficult and unbelievable is when he takes three irons with heads a few inches apart and drives three balls a distance of 150 yards each.

At the time of this writing, Kirkwood, who holds the Canadian open championship, is participating in the British Open Tournament at Sandwich, England, on the Royal St. Georges course.

Workers Protect U.S.S.R. Harvest

Peasants Are Mobilized Under Rigid Discipline In Anti-Drought Offensive

The struggle which is producing this year's Soviet harvest in the face of an early drought is of a nature and intensity probably never before seen in the world states a report from Kiev to the New York Times.

There is nothing haphazard in it, nothing left to chance. It was organized and is being carried through like a military offensive. Plans were drawn last Winter in Moscow, where an indomitable will and several very shrewd brains are at work in the Kremlin.

These plans were transmitted to the autonomous republics, and within them, as in an army corps, through regional authorities, machine tractor stations, heads of collective and state farms on down to the "buck private" peasant in the field.

Even within collective farms the military simile is pat. The farm workers, usually numbering several hundred, are divided into brigades of seventy-five to one hundred men and women, each under the command of a brigadier. These in turn are divided into "links" of five workers often composed of friends or kinsfolk, headed by a "link" leader.

No Deviation Permitted

At intervals this Summer decrees directing how the attack was to be pushed home have been issued from the Kremlin like battle orders from general headquarters. No deviation from this line of attack has been permitted. No excuse for failure are accepted, and willful disobedience of orders by leaders is punishable as a crime.

This year's unprecedented campaign has had two objectives. One is to provide bread, an absolute essential of the nation's diet, without which men and women are hungry, even if there is an abundance of other foods. The other is to establish beyond all challenge the system of collective farming, which means socialization of the most individualistic of all callings.

This harvest is especially critical, since it is the first since collectivization became really stabilized.

Both objectives appear to have been attained in a far measure, at least in this part of the Soviet Union.

Every one of the dozens of collective farmers with whom your correspondent has talked seemed genuinely optimistic. They are certain of a dividend this year. But there is gloom among the individual peasants who remain.

Grain Tax a Great Worry

Many of those with whom your correspondent talked in their thatched log huts, whitewashed inside and containing little furniture except an enormous stove on which the family sleeps in Winter, said they did not know how they would get through. Their tax, payable in grain, is higher than that of the collective farmers. Some said their tax alone would consume their petty grain harvest.

There is the contrast which is expected to break down their last hesitancy over joining the collectives.

"This year is the test year," said an agronomist at a machine tractor station. "It is all the better that we had the drought, for now this harvest is proving to the peasant that, with proper cultivation, he will get a crop, even if there is no rain. In other days the peasant left it to the weather, and if it failed him, he and his family went hungry."

Of course it is impossible to say on the strength of this one region that the crop has fared equally well elsewhere. But the fact that the measures taken here are a part of a nation-wide plan, unswervingly directed, gives reason to believe that similar skill and vigor have been shown elsewhere.

The Toyo Fibre Manufacturing Company was established in March this year. Upon its organization, the firm inherited all the rights of manufacturing the fibres produced by the former Teikoku Kenshi Co. and Niisa Shokai.

Since its establishment, the concern has been engaged in producing fine quality fibres and is now making great efforts to manufacture these articles on a large scale and also at moderate cost.

The materials for the fibres are all of domestic make. At present there are many enquiries from foreign lands.

Technocracy Is Still Growing, Declares Scott

First Technocrat Claims Large Gains In The West After Strategic Retreat

Technocracy is not dead nor even sleeping, but is gaining in power and numbers, especially on the West Coast. Howard Scott, the First Technocrat, revealed yesterday according to the July 22 issue of the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

The fact that it had gone West in a physical rather than a metaphorical sense was attested by numerous clippings he showed from newspapers, among them a front page story in "The Los Angeles Daily News" alongside action pictures of the San Francisco dock wars. Mr. Scott, just back from a tour of the West, where he spoke to crowds in the chief coast cities, indicated that his retreat from the East had been a strategic one, a case of going back a few steps the better to leap forward and upward.

He would not say how many he had enlisted under the banner of technocracy, but he spoke hopefully of the coming struggle for power and indicated that when the country smashes its head against the irrefutable logic of his curves showing alarming increases in population, production, debt and energy consumption, along with an equally terrifying decrease in man-hours per unit, 1,000,000 trained technocrats will be enough to turn the trick.

Membership Drive Gaining

The membership drive has taken like wildfire, Mr. Scott reports. Technocratic Youth Brigades deploy here and there, key men in transportation systems respond to orders from the chief with a military salute and the Monad has been adopted as the arm-band and lapel designation of thousands of Americans who no longer question that there is to be a "change" but who question only "how" and "whither?" This summer, nineteen radio stations, one of them of 50,000 watts, will go on the air for one evening a week, on donated time, to explain what Technocracy is, and study courses are being organized with handbooks of Wellsian scope on science.

The sincerest form of flattery has begun to embarrass Mr. Scott and his co-workers. An organization of 200,000 in southern California called "The Utopians, Inc.," has swiped some of the technocratic formulae and are preparing to spread out now on a national scale. It takes a great many ergs of Mr Scott's energy to keep denying that he has anything to do with them. He also had had to deny that he is back of Upton Sinclair's race for Governor of California on a quasi-technocratic ticket.

"We are back of no party. We have nothing to do with political organizations," said Mr. Scott yesterday as he refreshed himself with an ice-cream soda near his offices, 210 East Forty-third Street.

See Price System Failure

Dark, tall, leonine in appearance, with facial angles that suggest that he was hewn rather than molded by heredity and environment, a deep cut in his upper lip, a deep voice with pleasant overtones, broken by an occasional "Huh?" which he interjects while thinking of what he is to say next, the First Technocrat discoursed with the utmost persuasiveness on what the future holds for this country. It is evident that he is utterly persuaded himself that there is no hope for a civilization under the price system and it is a matter of some astonishment that those in the East cannot see it as clearly as those in the West.

"There's one possible explanation for it," he said. "This is not America here in the East. It is Europe—not America. People here think of social change in terms of Socialism or Communism. The true American can't see that at all. He doesn't want any of it. It's not indigenous. But he can see machines. he can see their technological use an abuse. He understands machines and engineering. Give him something like that and he takes to it like duck to water. It is indigenous, it is not an alien importation. Any social change in this country must arise from the native-born people of the country, it must be an indigenous movement. In two or three more years, when the government has dried up its doles and C.W.A. relief and R.F.C. financing, who knows?"

No Blueprints For Public

The blueprints for the taking over of power in the new Erewhon are not for the public gaze; in fact Mr. Scott discourages the idea that power is to be seized. He decries the clumsiness and unimaginativeness of the late general strike on the coast and said that he could have done much more to paralyze industry by stopping the flow of a few metals to metallurgical plants. The idea is that the machine age is an age of metallurgy primarily. Next in line of crippling force would be the shutting up shop by the tool and die makers, a few thousand of them out and industry would be on its knees and the public would not be starved or rendered hostile in the mean time.

"Our technological set-up is so complicated in our civilization," said Mr. Scott, "that when you displace a load factor anywhere along the line you have a grave unbalance. Why if 50,000 mothers and fathers were denied work or home relief tomorrow and decided that they couldn't continue to care for their children and marched with them down to the City Hall and laid them in the lap of the city, and said 'All right, you take care of them,' it would disrupt the government. The city couldn't accept such a job as that and get away with it. There would be deaths; the children couldn't survive until the government could readjust the load factor; the government couldn't survive. Some very small things can change load factors."

Mr. Scott gave a brief survey of what the technocratic life would be like—not immediately, but after the imbalances and load factor had been readjusted—a process which would take fifteen years, he thought. There would be no such thing as New York, because New York is uneconomic. The off peak load system means wastes which, if saved, would permit the tearing down and building of an entirely new and more evenly distributed city, where all processes from the delivery by milk to the disposition of garbage would be automatic and all the happy householders would have to do in exchange would be to work four hours a day for the equivalent of a $20,000 a year income. New York, as it is known today, would become one vast mine, a mine for the reclaiming of metals buried underground and beneath the limestone exteriors of skyscrapers.

Engergy Taken for Money

A non-transferable token of energy which cannot be stolen, grafted or given away, but which can only be spent for commodities, was fully described by Mr. Scott, down to the last watermark and accounting problem. This is to be what corresponds to money as closely as can be imagined under a non-price system. Technocracy goes much further than Moscow in this regard, for Moscow still deals in rubles and kopecks.

The United States, once Technocracy got started, would have no use for gold save to buy up all the manganese, tin, nickel and other metals not produced on this continent, which other nations would sell us. By sheer physics, the remainder of the world would have to organize on a technocratic basis, too. Another use for gold, Mr. Scott foresaw, was to give it in large quantities to people who were anti-social or not sufficiently intelligent to fit in under his system.

"We'd be glad to give 'em $10,000 apiece to get out of the country—with this one restriction: they couldn't get back in again," he said.

Mr. Scott was reminded that the chief of police at Pompton Lakes, N. J., where a deserted power house had been leased several years ago by the city to Mr. Scott and a few associates as a factory for making floor wax, was about to sell the effects found in the place to satisfy a judgment for $2,637 back rent.

Mr. Scott turned from the problem of getting rid of all the gold in America to this problem, without

He then turned back with conviction and charm to describing the templates for new worlds to be. turning a hair in the process.

"Yes, that's old stuff," he said. "It was in the Jersey papers last week."

Karuizawa Notes

The Rev. Charles A. Logan announces the engagement of his daughter, Mary Nelson Logan, to Mr. Delmar Myers Brown, teacher of English in the Fourth Higher school at Kanazawa. Miss Logan was formerly a teacher at Birmingham, Ala. Dr. Logan and his daughters, the Misses Mary and Martha Logan, have been spending the summer at Nojiri. They were week-end guests at the home of Dr. and Mrs. L. C. M. Smythe, 1072 Karuizawa.

Mrs. E. M. Manley, of Yokohama, was the week-end guest of Miss Polly Markham, of 1040 Karuizawa. Miss Markham left Monday for Shanghai to resume her teaching duties at St. John's University there.

Mrs. N. S. Ogburn, Mrs. Robert McClelland, and Mrs. G. H. Vinall and their children, Joan and Peter, visited Nikko and Lake Chuzenji Saturday.

Mr. Seiichi Hishikawa, instructor in English at the Yamaguchi Higher Commercial school, Yamaguchi prefecture, who was granted a six months' leave of absence by his school last April for further study, is in Karuizawa for the last part of his furlough.

Early in the spring, he visited the Imperial University of Tokyo and other schools of Japan for ideas which he may apply at Yamaguchi. Mr. Hishikawa has studied at the University of Washington, the University of Chicago, and Columbia University, New York City and is a member of the Columbia University club.

He said that there are about 500 boys enrolled in the Yamaguchi School all of whom are studying English. He teaches a course in which students translate English into Japanese. There are two other English teachers in the school, both of whom are foreigners.

Students in the school, he said, not only expect to apply their English in commercial careers which they will enter but also expect that it will be valuable during their leisure time when they will read English classics in the original.

Mr. Frank Huntley, teacher of English literature at Kyoto Doshisha University and the Kyoto Imperial University, was a guest of Mr. F. L. Roberts Monday.

Mme. Renee Tharigny, French pianist, is spending a few days at the Mampei hotel here. She has made a three months' tour of Japan and has given concerts in Tokyo, Osaka, and Kobe. From Karuizawa, she plans to visit Nikko and Kamikochi.

Rev. and Mrs. Lawrence Rose of Tokyo who have been guests at the home of Dr. Rachel Read, returned to Tokyo Monday.

Italy's Ability To Stay On Gold Is Questioned

Outflow Of Capital And Budget Deficit Among Reasons For Anxiety

Financially and economically Fascist Italy is in a difficult situation—so difficult that its ability to remain on the gold standard is being seriously questioned by many responsible authorities, says Paul Cremona in the Christian Science Monitor.

For nearly four years Italy fought gallantly under the dictatorship of Signor Benito Mussolini against the consequences of a world crisis of unprecedented magnitude. Until quite recently, Italy had seemed to be the one privileged country in the world which was feeling less acutely than other countries of greater resources and higher standards of living the effects of the depression. Her political institutions, the strong sense of discipline inculcated upon the people by Fascism, and the virtual control by the state of all the productive forces of the nation appeared to form a solid barrier sufficient to meet and overcome the unfavorable conditions caused by the crisis.

A set-back, however, began a few months ago, due largely to fighting a losing trade battle against depreciated currencies. The budget deficit was assuming alarming proportions; foreign trade was rapidly dwindling; the gold reserve of the Bank of Italy decreased by over 700,000,000 lire in the first five months of 1934; there was a wave of pessimism toward the lira reflected by the outflow of Italian capital; in a word, confidence in the financial and economic policy of the Fascist Government had, for the first time, been shaken. The situation, indeed, threatened to become so serious that several highly unpopular measures had to be taken to remedy it.

Although Italy is pursuing a policy of strict deflation, budget estimates for expenditures have been progressively increasing for the past three years, while estimates for revenue during the same period have been progressively decreasing. Budgets in the "red" can be balanced only in one of two ways—by raising additional revenue or by cutting down expenditure. Now, since the pressure of taxation has attained the limit beyond which it is not thought possible to go, the Government has decided to adopt the other alternative.

The recent debt conversion of 5 per cent consols into a 3½ per cent redeemable loan for an amount totaling about 61,400,000,000 lire and the reduction in the salaries of government employees will save the Treasury about 1,200,000,000 lire while a further 500,000,000 may be economized in other departments. The estimated deficit for the ensuing fiscal year of 2,900,000,000 lire is thus reduced to 1,200,000,000 lire. On the other hand, the allocation of 2,000,000,000 lire for the construction of new warships and airplanes, which will be spread during the next six financial years involves an additional expenditure of 330,000,000 million lire for next year, which again brings the estimated deficit to over 1,500,000,000 lire.

How this deficit will be met is a mystery, for while Signor Mussolini is firmly determined to balance the budget at all costs he admits that this cannot be done by further taxation. And no further savings seems to be possible unless the Government greatly reduces its program of public works.

Another disturbing factor is the falling off in exports. Ever since the stabilization of the lira in December, 1927, Italian exports have been decreasing. The shrinkage of exports as also accompanied by a decline of imports, but while for many years the tendency had been for exports to decrease less rapidly than imports the situation has completely reversed in the last few months. The adverse trade balance which during the last three years had remained in the same level of 1,450,000,000 lire, is expected this year to reach 3,000,000,000 lire.

By lowering costs in order to increase exports and by erecting customs and other barriers to decrease imports it is hoped to redress the trade balance. The real problem however, which Italy has not yet been able to solve, is to bridge the existing disparity between the internal and external purchasing power of the lira; in other words, between home and external prices.

Friday the Thirteenth

Since the calendar under the Gregorian system repeats itself every 400 years, this space of time is usually accepted as a larger time unit for the purpose of this calculation. Now in 400 years, including 97 leap years and 20,871 weeks, there are 4,800 months, each of which contains a thirteenth day. This 13th day will fall on Sunday 687 times, Monday 685, Tuesday 685, Wednesday 687, Thursday 684, Friday 688 and Saturday 684 times, showing that the 13th of the month falls more often on a Friday than on any other day in 400 years.

Pittsburgh

The statement regarding Pittsburgh's world record in the number of streets, avenues, and ways, is based on Louise's Street Guide page 6, 1931 edition. The story of the record price paid for a violin is contained in "The Violin and How to Make It—by a Master of the Instrument" page 58, published by Jean White, Boston. This bizarre deal involved 1500 acres of land, including the present site of the city of Pittsburgh, and an antique Stainer violin.

Age Of Earth About 3,000 Million Years

Study Of Number Of Meteors Leads To This Belief

Some years ago the National Research Council undertook to estimate the age of the earth. Of the forty different ways of arriving at that estimate few agree, the calculations running all the way from 100,000,000 to about 5,000 million years. The value generally accepted by geologists and physicists is 3,000 million, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The decay of uranium furnishes the best method of arriving at the age of the earth. For millions of years that radioactive element has been exploding at regular intervals. In the end it is reduced to lead—and stagnation. Count the time it took for this reduction to take place and it is as easy to determine the age of the earth as it is to watch sand running through an hour-glass.

Like others before him—Professor Alois F. Kovarik of Yale, for example—Dr. Robley D. Evans of the University of California decided to find out how much helium there is in meteorites, helium being given off by radium, which is in turn one of the products of uranium's decay. A young meteorite would contain very little helium.

According to Dr. Evans, about 200 meteorites have been thus tested. It is a stilting fact that their average age agrees with that of the earth's rocks, timed according to the uranium clock. In other words the value of 3,000 million years is about right both for meteorites and the earth.

This is as it should be. The solar system was certainly of one piece originally.

As radioactive elements break down energy is generated. So important is this source that, according to Dr. Evans, "it is more than adequate to supply all the heat that was lost from the earth by conduction through its crust, as well as to supply the energy for all mountain-building processes, including earthquakes and volcanoes; to supply an excess of heat sufficient to cause convection heat currents in the underlying rocks and hence to provide the energy and mechanical requirements needed to make possible the gradual drift or motion of continents across the earth's surface."

Giant Seaplane Breaks Many World's Records

of 160.4 miles an hour. The second ended at 1:21:13½ P. M. at an average of 155.2, the third at 3:20:28 at an average of 156.13, and the final lap at 5:18:36 at an average of 156.1.

The great plane had head and cross winds on her course although conditions generally were excellent. Her fastest time was 178.2 miles an hour on one of the runs between Fire Island and Block Island. On one short leg between Block Island and Point Judith, when head wind of about twenty-two miles an hour fought her, the speed dropped to 125.6 miles.

Altitude varied from almost sea level to 2,900 feet. Had she flown at the altitude she would use in service, about 6,000 to 8,000 feet, when the supercharging of her engines would come into play, she could have made at least ten miles an hour more without using any more of her horsepower.

In touch at all times by radio with the Pan American office in the Chrysler Building in New York and with the Sikorsky plant here, the airline radio men found that they could get the best contact with the speeding clipper by talking through their own radio station at Dinner Key at Miami, 1,200 miles away, even though the big boat might be winging down the Hudson just across the city's turrets from them.

List of Records Broken

The two records which fell to the Brazilian Clipper in previous flights were for carrying a payload of eight tons to a height of 15,084 feet and for carrying a payload of five and one half tons to an altitude of 21,800 feet.

The eight marks which she beat today were:

1,000 Kilometers (621.369 Miles) With No Payload Restriction—Record, 138.116 M.P.H., held by Germany.

2,000 Kilometers (1,242.739 Miles) With No Payload Restriction—Record, 117.396 M.P.H., held by France.

1,000 Kilometers (621.369 Miles) With 500 Kilos (1,102.311 Lbs.) Payload—Record, 138.116 M.P.H., held by Germany.

2,0000 Kilometers (1,242.739 Miles) With 500 Kilos (1,102.311 Lbs.) Payload—Record, 117.396 M.P.H., held by France.

1,000 Kilometers (621.369 Miles) With 1,000 Kilos (2,204.622 Lbs.) Payload—Record, 118.085 M.P.H., held by France.

2,000 Kilometers (1,242.739 Miles) With 1,000 Kilos (2,204.622 Lbs.) Payload—Record, 117.396 M.P.H., held by France.

1,000 Kilometers (621.369 Miles) With 2,000 Kilos (4,409.244 Lbs.) Payload —Record, 110.155 M.P.H., held by Germany.

The 1,000-kilometer mark made today was that of the average of the first two laps, 157.72 miles an hour.

Legs of the course flown in the record-breaking flight were Stratford Lighthouse to George Washington Bridge, 49.24 miles; to Staten Island Lighthouse, 21.38 miles; to Fire Island Lighthouse, 48.68 miles; to North Point Lighthouse, Block Island, 95.27 miles; to Point Judith Lighthouse, Narragansett Bay, 10.44 miles, and to Stratford Lighthouse, 85.69 miles.

The Brazilian Clipper will now go at once to Miami to have some shake-down runs preparatory to going into regular service down the east coast of South America.

This service will probably not be undertaking, however, until after the first of her two sister ships has been delivered and test flown for about eight weeks.

Welsh Festival Returns After Sixteen Years

National Eisteddfod Is Held At Neath; Pavilion Made To Hold 14,000

After 16 years the National Eisteddfod returns this week to Neath, which tonight has a festive appearance in honor of the event says the August 6 issue of The Times, London. A spacious pavilion, with room for 14,000, has been erected in Gnoll Park, only a few minutes' walk from the town center, while the Victoria Gardens, a short distance away, has been reserved for the two sessions of the Bardic Gorsedd. The drama competitions, which now are an integral part of the festival, will take place at the Gwyn Hall, in the heart of the town, and the Arts and Crafts Exhibition, which was opened on Friday, is conveniently housed at the Gnoll Schools. There has already been a large demand for season and day tickets, and record attendances are expected throughout the week if the weather is favorable.

The Eisteddfod this year is on a much more extensive scale than when it was last held here in 1918. The demands of the War had then laid a very heavy hand on the institution. Timber for the pavilion was unprocurable, so two large marquees were used to accommodate the audiences, and the ranks of the competitors were so depleted that four days were sufficient to dispose of the competitions. The present festival will run its full course of six crowded days, beginning with the brass bands and ambulance competition tomorrow, and going on to Saturday, when the chief male voice competition will be contested by the best choral organizations of South Wales.

In the aggregate the entries for the various musical events are well up to the standard of recent years, with a total of close upon 1,200. For the chief choral event on Wednesday the number is down to four, the lowest for some years, but there is compensation in the fact that this small entry includes one or two choirs which have made Eisteddfod history since the War. Eight fine bodies of singers have entered for the chief male voice competition on Saturday. In neither of these competitions has a choir been entered from outside the Principality, but among the eight who will sing in the Women's Choral competition is a choir from Hamilton, Ontario: and as the first prize of £35 is to be supplemented by a silver cup given by the Matabeleland Camborian Society, Southern Rhodesia, something of an inter-Imperial flavor will be imparted to the contest.

That instrumental music still lags in Wales would appear to be indicated by the fact that only one party has entered for the chief orchestral competition, and one also for school orchestras. On the other hand the entries for the vocal solo competitions are almost embarrssing in number, and there will be some drastic winnowing at the preliminary tests.

The Bards

On the literally side the bards have mustered well both for the Crown and Chair and for the lesser glories of sonnet and stanza, and other forms of verse construction. No fewer than 40 competitors have submitted poems in the Crown contest, and 11 metrical odes have been entered for the Chair, the bardic blue riband of the festival.

Two innovations introduced by the Neath committee are worthy of notice. The first is a competition for the Lewis Arnold memorial prize, confined to the winners in the principal solo competitions during the week. This will take place at Friday evening's concert. The other is a scholarship of £150, tenable at the Royal College of Music or the Royal Academy of Music for the most promising young musician discovered during the week.

The evening concerts follow traditional lines, with the Eisteddfod Choir of 700 voices and the London Symphony Orchestra taking the major works. Of outstanding interest is Thursday night's concert, when the choir will give Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," its first performance in Wales. The soloists engaged for the week include Mme. Conchita Supervia, who makes her debut to an Eisteddfod audience at the opening concert to-morrow night.

A diversion which has occasioned a slight controversy among the bards is the invitation extended to the Gorsedd to a banquet at St. Donat's Castle, the Welsh home of Mr. W. R. Hearst, the American newspaper proprietor, on Thursday evening. The bards, in official regalia, will approach the castle in processional order, and a fourteenth-century ceremonial will be observed before their admission to the banqueting hall. In the absence of the owner, the company will be welcomed by Mr. Lloyd George, who is himself a member of the Gorsedd, and is Mr. Hearst's guest during his visit to the Eisteddfod.

U.S.S.R. Harvest Suffers Due To 1933 Turmoil

Official Statistics Said To Be Fictitious; Supply Of Seed Grain Insufficient

The turmoil in the richest grainfields of Russia during 1933 was disastrous to agriculture, says a recent article in Times, London, by their Riga correspondent. The Government ceased publishing its weekly reports of the crops and harvest prospects. At the end of December, however, an official report was issued to the effect that the harvest had been a "record," due largely (according to the official statement) to favourable weather, which had produced crops of grain even where nothing had been sown since the preceding year.

It has since become known that the official statistics were largely fictitious. They had been worked out by a new system instead of the system used in previous years, and were intended above all to impress the Communist Congress which assembled at Moscow in January. Hundreds of thousands of hectares of wheat, rye, barley, and oats (1 hectare—2.471 acres) were left on the ground ungarnered. One Soviet newspaper estimated that one-seventh of the grain in the Soviet Union was ungathered and left to rot in the fields. All this was included in the official statistics as harvested grain. The deception appears to have been deliberate, since the Government took special precautions to prevent the circulation of information about the harvest from all but official sources. Correspondents of foreign newspapers accredited to Russia were forbidden last summer and autumn to go to the Ukraine, the Caucasus, and other parts of the countryside. They were, indeed, allowed to leave Moscow only after obtaining special permits from the Government.

Official optimism which prevailed at the Communist Congress in January was maintained after the Congress closed, and its hopeful influence was felt outside Communist circles. The Government stimulated this with a number of measures in March relaxing the grain regime, and it appeared that the policy of dragooning the peasantry was being mitigated. Ploughing and sowing began early, but it was hampered by the heritage from 1933. The repair of agricultural machinery had been carried out during the winter only imperfetly and draught cattle had been depleted by slaughter and neglect.

Cows in Ploughs

The rigorous collection of the Government's levy last year had left the North Caucasus and the Black Sea regions with an insufficiency of seed grain. Even the State farms in these grain areas lacked more than 100,000 tons of seed, according to the Soviet Press. To combat the scarcity of draught cattle, the Government ordered the peasants to use their cows for ploughing to make good the deficiency in horses and oxen. This had been practised to some extent also in 1933. But all kinds of cattle had been reduced in number, and the cows were able to make good only part of the deficiency. On June 21 and 28 Pravda stated as examples of this that in East Siberia the number of cattle in 1930 was 6,756,000 head, but now it was only 3,857,000; in North Caucasus it was 6,358,000 head in 1930, but now only 3,933,000.

In January Stalin stated that the horses and horned cattle in the whole Union had decreased from 32,700,000 in 1930 to 55,200,000 in 1933, the losses being due chiefly to indiscriminate slaughter by class enemies among the peasantry. The official reports, the regular publication of which was resumed this spring, state that in spite of the difficulties the entire grain areas have been sown this year according to plan. M. Khataievich, one of the present Communist leaders in the Ukraine, has now published an article explaining that the areas were indeed sown according to plan, but they were not sown properly. The crop failures are (he says) not due exclusively to drought but in great measure also to excessive interference by distant officials who gave wrong orders, which the men on the spot carried out against their own better judgment.

Khatalevich quaintly adds: "Perhaps we are ourselves to blame for this. Perhaps we have punished people too much at random and they now fear to do anything not exactly as instructed, lest they have to pay the penalty." He hopes that in future the man on the spot will not be hampered so much by less competent officials sending out instructions from their centralized offices in the Soviet capitals. But he urges that something be done to provide late crops this year on the ground where the first crops have failed. Efforts are to be made to sow millet on the harvested wheat fields, and it is hoped that the millet may mature in time to compensate in some measure for the loss of the earlier crops. The crops are in many cases too poor to be reaped by machinery, and the peasants have been ordered to revert to hand labour wherever this appears advantageous. Brigades of gleaners are to go over the ground a second time with hand-rakes to retrieve and deliver what they can.

Guarding the Grain

The Government has announced that it will levy the same quantities of grain as it did last year. It is doubtful, however, whether this will be possible. Elaborate measures have been taken to guard the grain barbers," who cut off the ears from standing crops, carrying away their booty in pockets, hats, and aprons. The penalty for such theft—which is often from the fields which the "thieves" have themselves cultivated and which nominally belongs to them—is death. After the few indications of a more liberal policy in the spring the strict regime of last year is now being enforced again, the penalty being mitigated in some cases to 10 years forced labour. The law does not allow any mitigation beyond this limit.

Timber constructions with high "crows' nests" for crop guards have been erected at vantage points throughout the grain areas, from which observers watch the grain fields day and night. Bands of children armed with sticks are in attendance to chase and capture thieves with the aid of dogs. Occasionally the authorities reward enthusiastic children with the title of "Hero" for giving up their nearest relatives caught stealing grain.

Portugal And South Africa Act To Better Natives' Lot

Christian Science Monitor

CAPE TOWN, S. Af.—Better treatment of Mozambique natives and a more equitable distribution of trade are problems being considered by the Governments of the Union of South Africa and Portugal, whose representatives are meeting at Lourenco Marques; to revise the Mozambique Convention of 1928.

The most important question to both countries is the supply of natives for the Rand mines. Under the Convention the maximum complement of Portuguese natives from Mozambique employed by the mines was reduced from 100,000 to 80,000. The mines have had to pay the Portuguese Government a registration fee of 1s. on each native on original engagement, and 1s. on re-engagement.

A further monthly fee of 2s. on each native for every month during which he is employed has also had to be paid. Thus with 80,000 Mozambique natives employed last year, the mines had to pay £96,000, plus 1s. for each native on engagement which amounts to at least £400—a total of £100,000.

Natives Pay Fees

Passport fees have also had to be paid to the Portuguese Government by the natives, and if the total fees received by that Government in any year have amounted to less than 35s. multiplied by the average number of Portuguese natives employed by the mines during the year, the mines have had to supply the deficiency.

Under the present agreement, the lot of the Portuguese native is unfortunate and there is a feeling that the Union should press for an amelioration of his conditions of work. Forced repatriation of the imported native from Mozambique, heavy deductions from pay, customs exactions imposed on his way home, arbitrary limitation of his period of service—these are factors which have brought the Convention under criticism from people who are concerned mainly with fair treatment for subject races. It is almost certain that under the revised treaty the lot of the native will be greatly improved.

Today the South African mines are much less dependent on imported labor. Their total recruitment order has mounted past the 200,000 mark, and labor shortage has almost disappeared. But additions and replacements have mainly come from the Union, and the Maximum of 80,000 natives provided for in the Convention has not been reached for some months past.

Portuguese Labor Costly

Although Portuguese labor is the best it is also by far the most expensive and for that reason alone union labor when available commands a preference.

The other feature of the 1928 convention which is responsible for losing the union railways and ports a considerable amount of revenue deals with the section whereby the Union Government undertook to secure to the port and railways of Lourenco Marques from 50 to 55 per cent of the total tonnage of commercial seaborne traffic imported into those of the Transvaal known as the "competitive area."

In computing the percentage of sea-borne goods, traffic for the civil, military and railway authorities is excluded. As the "competitive area" is the Union's heaviest importing area the Union railways have been paying heavily under the Convention. Fifty to 55 per cent of the traffic must go through Portuguese territory to the detriment of the Union's revenue.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Last Prisoner of the Bastile

Louis Sebastien Mercier's "Dictionnaire Encyclopedique," which was published in 1781 without the author's name was seized by the French Government and its printer Fauche was imprisoned.

The charge was that the book contained words inimical to the security of the State and reflecting upon His Majesty's system of government. A sentence of "reclusion perpetuelle" was pronounced against the book and the volume was confined in the Bastile in 1786, three years before the structure was destroyed. The author, Mercier, was a member of the French Assembly during the Revolution and as such cast his vote in favor of lifelong imprisonment for King Louis XVI.

The Pastor-Florist

When F. V. Hoyt, aged 75, of Spokane, Washington, obtained a marriage license recently to wed Maria H. Buchanan, 72, he told County Auditor Glover that he had married his bride to two other men while a pastor and was now marrying her himself.

Mr. Hoyt was a pastor, and on April 25, 1900, he married Miss Maria and John Todd. Mr. Todd died in 1922, and his widow married again on Sept. 16, 1927, this time to Duncan Buchanan, who died in the spring of 1933. The ceremony was again performed by Pastor Hoyt. Then on December 21, 1933, Mrs. Buchanan went to the altar with Mr. Hoyt—the man who had married her twice before!

Hoover Accepts Roosevelt's Dare And Examines the Bill of Rights

In a sunny study looking far across this warm and spicy Californian countryside, a man has been thinking and writing of human liberty throughout the world. Most of all, he has been thinking of human liberty in the United States of America, and he intends to indicate where and how he thinks it is being challenged, according to Erwin D. Canham writing from Palo Alto, Calif, on August 4 to the Christian Science Monitor.

The man is Hebert Hoover, and the announcement that he is to publish a book, called "The Challenge to Human Liberty," marks the first break in the impenetrable wall of silence which has settled around the house on San Juan Hill ever since the second man bearing the same name as the first to storm a hill called San Juan entered the White House. Two chapters of the book will be published in a well-known weekly magazine.

The Palo Alto wall has been impenetrable only to publicity. Mr. Hoover's friendly contacts have been many. He has even been host to newspaper men and it was my privilege to spend an afternoon with him this week. He talked freely upon all aspects of the present situation in the United States and the world, but he said:

Not For Publication

"You understand that I am not talking for publication."

The very next day, Aug. 1, it was announced that Mr. Hoover's book is to appear in September. Very well, what does Mr. Hoover think about "The Challenge to Human Liberty"? It is impossible to repeat those things which he said in confidence.

But Mr. Hoover has plenty of friends hereabouts, and they have a very good idea of his views. Without violating the former President's confidences, I think I can reconstruct from the close and intimate impressions of others, a partial picture of his outlook today.

According to these sources, Mr. Hoover holds a sane middle course. He does not consider, for instance, that the American nation is in dire peril from Communism, Socialism, Nazism, Fascism and the other isms which he will examine in his book.

But he believes that Americanism should receive the careful attention, serious study, analysis and exposition in the United States which foreignisms are receiving.

There is an interesting illustration on the Stanford University campus, under Mr. Hoover's windows. The university has a required course in citizenship." Some of the students are said to have gone to Mr. Hoover and protested that their young professors were "Communists" and "Socialists" because of their teaching. The former President, who takes an active interest in the university's development, investigated and found that the young professors were nothing of the kind.

Analyze Governments

They had simply devoted a great deal of attention to analyzing foreign forms of government, objectively, using the terminology and ideology which has sprung up around these forms. They had failed, as is so often the case in the United States, to build up the same ideology for Americanism. Here was the national problem in a nutshell.

It is this task to which Mr. Hoover is presumably now devoting himself, just as these Standford instructors, apparently on his advice, have now built up a genuine course in Americanism.

There is reason to believe that the former President still is unwilling to appear to attack the Roosevelt Administration. He has been notably objective in his attitude toward things as they are run from Washington, at least by contrast with some of the more extreme members of his party.

But it is equally clear, according to those here who should know best, that Mr. Hoover believes human liberty is being challenged in the United States today. The crop restriction program which tells a farmer that he may not plant beyond a certain acreage; the NRA curbs and quotas that prevent the industrialist from manufacturing what he can, and selling it at the price he can, seem all in the Hoover view to be violations of fundamental American guarantees in the bill of rights.

Book Will Make Pat Reply

The former President's book, therefore, is a direct reply to President Roosevelt's invitation, in his last radio address to the nation before leaving for Hawaii, to examine the Bill of Rights. It was started before the Roosevelt challenge, of course, but as a reply it comes pat.

It is almost needless to state that Mr. Hoover believes the guarantees of liberty contained in the Bill of Rights and the American Constitution are the fundamental bases of civilization and progress on this continent. The administration that violates them, he is said to feel, is paving the way for its own failure.

Not the experiments of the Roosevelt Administration—many of which he apparently thinks were already in the American system and would have been tried anyway—but its alleged violation of liberty, seems to be Mr. Hoover's chief preoccupation. Toward the experiments he has many sympathetic leanings, and of course several of them were incubated during his own period in office.

Dramatic Return to Arena

Nor does the so-called threat of "Communism," as seen in radical agitations in many parts of the nation, alarm the former President so much as does the Fascist threat of armed reprisals which also are vividly seen in the country.

It is useless to claim that the forthcoming book, "The Challenge to Human Liberty," will be without domestic political implications. However critical the situation abroad, the issues of human liberty are being sought out right here at home. Mr. Hoover intends to make himself the defender of fundamental American principles. This can hardly be classed as less than a return to the public arena.

But, in the opinion of Mr. Hoover's friends, he is fulfilling a patriotic duty. Nobody else in his party, from the Borah wing to the Fletcher wing, is defending human liberty in just this fashion. From his placid sub-tropical retreat, the former President emerges as a political philosopher. He also emerges as a leader who, this time, may strike a chord which will reecho widely in the country's popular sentiment.

Not the Only One

Many people beside the former President have been thinking about the issues of freedom. They will be interested to hear what he has to say. That is the viewpoint of the Hoover entourage.

This has been delicate ground. To disentangle what may, and what may not be printed is difficult. But, confidences apart, it is clear that the gates of Palo Alto have swung ajar. The chains were up to bar intruders when I rode up the hill this week. But lounging on the drive was Boris, the former President's faithful valet. He greeted me like a long-lost friend, and hustled me into the house with his own private latchkey.

Mr. Hoover was in his study, working at accumulated material on his desk. He was ruddy and seemed fit. His hair was much grayer than in Washington. But he was at peace with the world. No grievance lurked there, and no resentment.

Holds No Bitterness

His discussion of present affairs was far from bitter; it had none of the intemperance of Republican campaign speakers. It was poised and unworried, and there was a fundamental strain of confidence that the American people would reject alien challenges and ultimately come out on top, which belied the gloomy distrusts of many of today's prophets of disaster.

The former President was obviously enjoying the sunshine, and such relaxation as the frolics at San Francisco's famous bohemian grove from which he had just returned. His white flannels and sport shoes were comfortable, his collar not quite so high as it used to be in Washington and the White House seemed somehow very far away.

British Social Service Council Aids Thousands

2,300 Centers Opened And Are Used By 250,000 Men And Women

A growth of voluntary effort in many directions, and notably in connexion with unemployment, is recorded in the fourteenth annual report of the National Council of Social Service, say The Times, London.

In the past year the council have greatly extended their efforts to stimulate local initiative and encourage every kind of constructive attempt to help unemployed people. In many areas organizations already existde through which advice could be given by people who knew what help was available in the devlopment of educational and other branches of activity. Councils of social service in many towns and rural community councils in counties took the initiative in forming special committees to promote action. The Churches, the British Legion, Toc H, and many national voluntary bodies encouraged their local branches to help, while the mayors of many towns called meetings and formed special committees to meet representatives of the unemployed, find buildings which were suitable for use as occupational clubs and to start work. Through the action of these various groups rapid development took place and the report notes that some 2,300 centres have now been opened and made use of, for shorter or longer periods, by over 250,000 men and women.

While no uniform pattern has been either suggested or adopted, certain general principles, it is stated, are being observed by the majority of the centres. Most of them have a membership list, with a subscription, generally of 1d. a week; articles made by the men may not be sold or disposed of in any way that might injure the market of those who are employed; there is no attempt to train people for trade; members sometimes elect their own managing committees or at least in most places are represented on it.

The comment is made that a cross-section of the men and women who are out of work would present almost as great a variety of experience, aptitude, age, and occupation as could be found by taking a cross-section of society as a whole, and it becomes more and more evident that if the clubs are to attract men of different tastes and different social or industrial experience they must offer a variety of opportunities for using free time. There must, it is submitted, be growth and extension. The problems of those who are responsible for local effort is to find activities which quicken interest and appeal to men and women as being worth while, although they give no immediate return in cash.

A Call For Leaders

On the discovery and training of leaders for this type of work the future success of the clubs will almost entirely depend. Physical training, handicrafts, music, drama, and formal study could be far more widely extended and much greater variety introduced into the clubs if more men and women were available to take the lead.

During the past year various methods were adopted for filling the gap. The Y. M. C. A. cooperated with the council by providing advisers to visit centres and help in the promotion of courses in physical training. The National Council of Girls' Clubs carried out an experiment in the organization of classes of a rather special kind in physical training for women. The National Federation of Women's Institutes provided teachers trained by them in certain forms of handicraft suitable for both men and women. The Rural Industries Bureau appointed handicraft advisers to visit centres and give demonstrations in woodwork and advice on the organization of the work.

In addition, the Educational Settlements Association and the British Association of Residential Settlements, with the help of grants from the Pilgrim Trust and in some cases from the National Council, were able to extend the work of settlements in some of the distressed areas through which advice and help can be made available for all the centres accessible from them, and opportunities provided for the training of leaders for study circles and other activities.

As another method of developing leadrship, selected men and women from occupational centres are being enabled to spend a period, varying from a week to a month, at a residential centre providing special courses in various branches of work. The provision of residential houses of this type may assist, the report states, the growth of a new cultural movement whose influence will spread through the occupation centres to large numbers of men and women for whom opportunities of this kind have hitherto been out of reach.

The Prince's Help

In the course of the last two years, it is recalled, the Prince of Wales, to whose leadership the social service movement owes so much, has visited hundreds of centres as Patron of the National Council.

In a general introduction to the report the council say that they have played heir part in connexion with unemployment, but have not relaxed their efforts in other directions to further community service in town and country. Councils of social service and community associations are trying to promote the acceptance of local responsibility and mutual concern in many of the problems of town life, and there is an immense field of usefulness before them.

The National Council's part is to stimulate and help such local work, and requests for help and guidance have so increased during the past year that it has become impossible to meet them all from the London office. Area offices have therefore been opened in Leeds, Birmingham, and Cardiff.

Two interesting chapters of the report deal with the problems of better living in the country, and old problems in new towns. It is remarked that if a hall is needed by every village community, a similar home for social and educational activities is most urgently needed in each of the communities settled on the new housing estates which now surround so many cities.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

Beck Condemns New Dealers, Who Sneer at Former Master

Representative James M. Beck (R.) of Pennsylvania, speaking yesterday at exercises in honor of the late Calvin Coolidge, charged that the New Deal had subjugated "individualism" and said that "dictatorial powers are not less dictatorial because they might be politely and apologetically exercised," says an A.P. dispatch from Plymouth, Vt. appearing in the Christian Science Monitor on August 5.

Crowds gathered today in this Vermont hamlet, tucked in a pocket of the Green Mountains, to pay homage to Calvin Coolidge on the eleventh anniversary of his induction into office as the thirtieth President of the United States.

On a slope opposite the country graveyard where the former President lies beneath a simple slab, a large grandstand had been erected. Men prominent in the political life of the nation prepared to deliver addresses in eulogy of the farm boy who left the tiny village of Plymouth to ascend the highest post in his country.

Apprentices Sneer at Master

Mr. Beck attacked those who criticized the administration of President Coolidge, saying:

"It is the fashion of some of the academic apprentices, who now constitute an overgrown federal bureaucracy, to sneer at the administration of Calvin Coolidge. Let me remind them that if they, in their various schemes to redistribute wealth, are now able to command the lavish and too-often wanton expenditure of billions of dollars, their opportunity thus to scatter billions is partly due to the wise administration of Calvin Coolidge, which in a few short years had not only paid all the expenses of the Government out of current receipts, but had reduced the national debt by the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000.

"Those who have in a short 12 months now added $12,000,000,000 to the national debt, ought not to criticize a President who reduced it by almost the same sum. He reduced the burdens of the people. They have imposed intolerable burdens of debt upon the American people which will curse our people for a century to come."

Contending that under the New Deal, "individualism" was smothered, he said:

Not New Deal; Square Deal

"If Calvin Coolidge were alive today he would prefer that 'square deal' of individualism to the 'new deal' of bureaucratic regimentation which has changed the American from a citizen to a subject.

"The Constitution never intended to vest all powers over trade and industry in the Federal Government. It prescribed a much narrower channel of power. Each state was to regulate in its own discretion the trade and industry that was in its borders. Today the federal bureaucracy controls all trade and industry within the United States. Never in the history of our nation has there been such an usurpation of power by the Federal Government.

"It cannot be reconciled with the plain provisions of the Constitution and it cannot be justified on the theory of an emergency, for if a so-called emergency can temporarily suspend the Constitution, then we are living under a government of unlimited powers, for the Federal Government can, at any time, when inspired by the lust of power, create the emergency, then declare its existence and then arbitrarily suspend the Constitution. That great compact never authorized the creation of a dictator or a suspension of its mandates."

Speaking of the power behind the New Deal, Mr. Beck said:

"I appreciate that the dictatorial powers of the NRA and the AAA have been exercised by an iron hand veiled in a velvet glove. A pretended spirit of moderation has been one concession to the American spirit but dictatorial powers are not less dictatorial because they might be politely and apologetically exercised . . . You cannot give a bureaucratic official the sword of absolute power and not expect him to use it when the spirit moves him."

The speaker came to the defense of Henry Ford, whom he termed "America's greatest industrialist."

Austin Defends Coolidge

"No one questions," he said, "that Mr. Ford was under no obligation to sign the automobile code. As an individualist he preferred to conduct his business without the protection of the Blue Eagle, which he regarded as an emblem of governmental tyranny. To the administration of the NRA this was high treason, similar to that when William Tell refused to bow to Gessler's cap in the town of Altorf."

Although Henry Ford was under no legal obligation to sign the code, and voluntarily complied with its provisions, the NRA proceeded to injure him in every way that bureaucratic ingenuity could devise. In his case, at least, the Blue Eagle, which to others may seem a harmless domesticated bird, closely resembled the Soviet buzzard.

Senator Warren R. Austin (R.) of Vermont, after briefly eulogizing Coolidge, launched into a vigorous denunciation of the present Administration.

He interspersed his criticism with quotations from various political pronouncements of Coolidge, showing by implication that the Vermonter's credo was hostile to the ideals of those now in power.

Protect his precious teeth against FILM

FILM is one of the greatest causes of tooth decay—and tooth decay often results in the loss of teeth.

In film are tiny, rod-shaped germs—lactobacilli. These germs produce strong acid which eats away tooth enamel just as other acids burn holes in cloth or wood. Deeper and deeper go the acids. Finally the nerve is reached . . . the root canal infected . . . and unless repaired, results may prove tragic.

To fight dangerous film, use Pepsodent instead of ordinary tooth pastes. Why? Because Pepsodent contains a special film-removing substance that is one of the great discoveries in oral hygiene. Its power to remove every trace of film stain is revolutionary! Be safe—use Pepsodent twice a day and see your dentist at least twice a year.

Social and Personal Notes

Premier Admiral Keisuke Okada held an informal reception at his official residence Wednesday afternoon when 400 farmers of Takahama, Oi-gun, Fukui prefecture, the town where the Premier was born, called on him. The guests presented the Premier with a charm from the shrine before which he worshipped in his home town. The farmers were on their way to the Narita Shrine and had originally planned to call on the Premier after their visit to the shrine but as someone in the group had suggested that the Premier was more important in helping to solve their immediate problems than the god in the shrine, they decided to visit him first.

Diegel's 65 Best In Canadian Golf

Becomes First Player To Beat Par 70 At Lakeview Course In Open Play

TORONTO, Aug. 2.—Leo Diegel of Philadelphia, who has won the title four times since 1924, led the field today in the first eighteen holes of the Canadian open golf championship. He covered the par-70 Lakeview course in sixtyfive strokes to hold a four-stroke margin.

Diegel, long a favorite with Canadian galleries, shot the outgoing nine in 34, one under par, and came home in 31, the first player to better Lakeview's par in competition.

His record-smashing round included seven birdies—two of which came on the first nine. He went over regulation figures twice, on the ninth and eighteenth holes. He would have had a 64 if his putt on the home green had not hung stubbornly on the lip of the cup.

U. S. Golfers Shine

Contenders from the United States dominated the tournament. Tommy Armour of Chicago was in second place. Armour, who won the Canadian title in 1927 and 1930, played steadily for a 69, going out in 34 and coming home in 35.

Denny Shute, former British open champion from Philadelphia, held third place with 35, 36—71 and seven tied for fourth with 72s. They were Bill Mehlhorn of Louisville, Jimmy Hines and Herman Barron, both of New York, and four Canadian professionals—Dave Ferguson and Bob Cunningham of Toronto, Jules Huot of Quebec and Wally Smithers of Ottawa.

The group at 73 included the amateur, Al Grimsditch of Toronto, and the Americans, Fay Coleman of Culver City, Calif.; Harry Cooper of Chicago, Willie Macfarlane of Tuckahoe, N. Y., and Joe Belford of Detroit.

Somerville Scores a 75

C. Ross (Sandy) Somerville, the only Canadian ever to win the United States amateur title, had a 36, 39—75.

Gene Sarazen of New York, former British and American open champion, had had an 80, ten over par. Between him and the leaders were Ky Laffoon, young Denver star, with a 79; Walter Hagen of Detroit, Stan Kertes of San Francisco, Al Watrous of Detroit and Ed Dudley of Philadelphia, all with 77s.

Play will continue with another eighteen-hole round tomorrow and thirty-six holes Saturday.

Dry Skies Weep When Russians Use Chemicals

Four Years Of Experiment In Central Asia Gives Hope Of Control Of Weather

After four years of experiments on the high and arid plateaus of Turkmanistan in Central Asia, a group of Russian natural scientists has obtained some interesting results in control of rainfall, which suggest to optimistic Soviet journalists the possibility that man may sooner or later actually control not only rainfall but weather and climate in general, says a Moscow dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

In a preliminary report of his experiment, Prof. B. A. Fedoseeff, director of the Turkmanistan Institute of Rainfall, declares that he and his associates have succeeded in creating artificial mist, artificial clouds, and by dropping chemical compounds from an airplane into natural rainless clouds have on several occasions actually produced rain.

The institute now is working on the problem of producing rain from artificial clouds, and if this problem is solved, the director believes he will be able to produce rain at will from a cloudless sky. The institute also is working on the reverse problem of preventing rainfall in regions where it is excessive.

Chemicals Dropped on Clouds

The Soviet Government established this Institute of Rainfall in 1930, said to be the first of its kind, assigning a group headed by Professor Fedoseeff to work in Turkmanistan, an arid region in which conditions were considered ideal for experimental work. Patient research was carried on without spectacular results until this year.

Between March 11 and April 24 the institute carried out experiments with a specially equipped airplane following a long dry period. They dropped chemical compounds from the plane into natural clouds, and on several occasions succeeded in producing rain in from five to seven minutes. Bright strips appeared in the clouds where the chemicals had fallen, spreading quickly.

The color of the clouds turned from dark gray to milky white, and soon after rain began to fall, first in small and occasional drops and then in a definite downpour. However, the clouds quickly evaporated and finally disappeared altogether. The first drops contained evidence of the chemicals, but later ones were natural raindrops.

Moisture in Arid Places

Researches have convinced the scientists that even in the most arid regions the atmosphere contains enough moisture to make sufficient rainfall possible for agriculture. In Turkman deserts, where the sky is cloudless for months on end, experiments were conducted in producing artificial mist from which clouds would form.

In May, this year, a heavy fog was produced by burning chemicals in a row of saucers on the ground. The fog, or mist, continued for four hours and covered an area of 20 square kilometers, and the chemicals used cost less than $2. From this fog several small artificial clouds were formed.

The institute now is seeking to make artificial clouds sufficiently large and dense so that chemicals dropped from an airplane will precipitate rain. If this is accomplished, rain can be produced from a cloudless sky.

Screen Folks

Walt Disney Melodrama

Production has been started on the Silly Symphony, "Who Killed Cock Robin?", the first Disney mystery melodrama, and a new era opens up.

In creating the series of films of which "Three Little Pigs" and "The Big Bad Wolf" are outstanding representatives, Disney started a vogue that caught the fancy of audiences in every corner of the world. Their popularity exceeded even those early Walt Disney productions that depicted music inanimation—that school of film through which the now famous "Skeleton Dance" was the rousing progenitor.

Now comes "Who Killed Cock Robin?", the daddy of all detective tales, and the characters which flow from Disney's imagination find new and mysterious fields to conquer.

"Three Little Pigs" may have been a story that formed a part of everyone's childhood. Before Disney performed his magic and made it a world-famous screen cartoon it was certainly nothing more than a nursery fable—but now it begins to seem possible that the old fable itself was taken from the Silly Symphony!

Claudette Colbert Much Sought

After tests lasting eight months and covering Hollywood, New York and way stations, John M. Stahl, Universal director has found the ideal actress for the most difficult role he has ever cast, the role of Bea Pullman. Claudette Colbert stage and screen star as signed recently to play this role, the lead in "Imitation of Life," which Stahl will make from the famous novel by Fannie Hurst. The screen play for this production has been written by George O'Neil, well known playwright who wrote the film script for "Only Yesterday" which brought Margaret Sullavan to fame in the picture world. Universal borrowed Miss Colbert from Paramount where she has just finished "Cleopatra." Fifty tests of Hollywood and Broadway possibilities brought him no closer to his objective. At last he decided to cast the role from life. He made a special tour through California looking for an untrained girl who would fit the part. He had no success. An extended trip followed as far as New York. No one could be found to come up to his requirements. It was not until many tests had been made of Miss Colbert that Stahl was satisfied that the role would be played as he wished

George Arliss in "Richelieu"

An interesting production announcement from United Artists, the company which releases the Samuel Goldwyn pictures as well as 20th Century productions, is that "Richelieu" will be George Arliss' next starring vehicle. The film will be made when the star returns to Hollywood next fall from his annual vacation in England.

In selecting the character of the famous French cardinal for Mr. Arliss, Mr. Arliss himself is especially pleased at the opportunity to create Richelieu for the talking screen. His portraits of Disraeli and Nathan Rothschild stand high among the greatest characterizations in the history of motion pictures.

Charles Laughton's New Play

"Ruggles of Red Gap," with Charles Laughton, Charlie Ruggles, Mary Boland, Sir Guy Standing, Evelyn Venable and Kent Taylor will be one of Paramount's big spectacles for summer filming, the studios have announced, following consummation of a deal whereby the play rights to Harry Leon Wilson's celebrated novel were purchased from the Shuberts in New York.

This famous comedy will be Laughton's first picture for his home company since "White Woman" made almost eight months ago.

Gary Cooper an Out-of-Doors Man

But for the circumstance of Fate, which made him a movie star, Gary Cooper might have become a rancher—one of those numberless millions of men who fructify the soil with the sweat of their labors.

The Paramount star is a rugged type. Tall, gaunt and rangy as the Montana hills which witnessed his birth, he feels a natural aversion to dressed-up roles, would rather appear bare-throated in lusty, earthy sagas.

Thus it is that he is a movie actor, more often than not caprisoned in dress suits, trappings of an advanced culture for which he has considerable contempt. The uniformity of tie knots, the stiff collars and the strict regimentation of this same culture annoy him. He would like to escape it: in time he will.

Clinically observed, he gives the impression of harboring smouldering moods—an effect not unlike a symphony of minor notes. His eyes are focused far ahead, dreamily hurtling barriers of distance to center upon unseen mental horizons. So engaged, he weaves fantastic dreams out of cloud arrangements—an agrarian practice as old as man.

Some day this same Gary Cooper will settle permanently on a ranch. He admits as much, also that he has attempted twice to settle on the soil, but each time his Fate called him back to Hollywood and the accoutrements of a profession which is only secondary to his thoughts.

Chancellor Says Germany Will Not Commence War

'Nazis Convinced War Cannot Benefit Anyone;' 'Party Is Stronger Than Ever'

Chancellor Hitler told Ward Price on August 5, in an exclusive interview on behalf of The London Mail that "if it rests with Germany, war will not come again."

"This country has a more profound impression than any other of the evils war causes," the Chancellor said. "Ninety-five per cent of the members of our national administration have had personal experience with the horrors of war and know that it is not an adventure but a ghastly catastrophe.

"It is the disciplined conviction of the Nazi movement that war can benefit nobody, but only bring about general ruin. Nineteen-eighteen was a lesson and a warning for us."

Germany's present problems could not be settled by war, the Chancellor added.

"We ask only that our present frontiers shall be maintained," he said, "and believe me we shall never fight again except in self-defense."

Says Polish Pact Proves Aims

Herr Hitler said in the interview he had repeatedly assured France that once the Saar question was settled there would be no further territorial differences between Germany and France. He said Germany had further proved her peaceful intentions by completing a pact with Poland.

Referring to the statement in London of Acting Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin last week that Britain's frontier was on the Rhine, the Chancellor said:

"Maybe French statesmen will go further and say that France must defend herself on the River Oder; or Russia might claim her line of defense was the Danube."

Germany, he said, can scarcely be reproached if she seeks to obtain protection within her own frontiers.

"Unless England attacks us," he said, "we shall never have a conflict with England, on the Rhine or anywhere else. We want nothing from England."

"Not even colonies?" the interviewer suggested.

"I would not sacrifice the life of any German to get any colony in the world," Herr Hitler replied with an emphatic gesture, adding that the former German African colonies were proving costly and luxurious for Britain.

Affirming that the increase in Britain's air fleet had not caused the slightest resentment in Germany, Herr Hitler said:

"Britain lies right outside our calculations."

Sees Germany Encircled

Such defensive steps as Germany is taking are caused, he said, by the fact that Germany is surrounded on the Continent by a ring of powerful potential foes who might some day make demands that Germany could not accept.

The interviewer referred to recent allegations that Germany was indirectly meddling in Austria in a manner that might make war inevitable.

"We shall not attack Austria," Herr Hitler answered brusquely, "but we cannot prevent Austrians from seeking to restore their ancient connection with Germany."

Replying to the interviewer's question as to whether he aimed at restoring the connection, Herr Hitler said:

"Anschluss is not a problem of the present day. Austrian independence lies outside all discussion and nobody questions it.

"It is natural that Germans of Austria should incline toward union with Germany, but we all know this. The aim is impossible at present, because opposition to it from the rest of Europe would be too great."

Questioned concerning his present immense powers within Germany, gained by the death of President von Hindenburg, the Chancellor said that every year he had submitted his powers to the German people, who could confirm or withdraw them.

"Is your combined office as head of the State and Chancellor to be held for life?" the interviewer asked.

"It will last until the basis of this government is removed by a national vote," said Herr Hitler.

Finds Party Stronger Than Ever

The recent stern repression of a division to the Nazi party was referred to, and Herr Hitler was asked whether he were satisfied that the party was now completely united. His eyes flashed as he replied:

"It is stronger and more solid now than it ever was."

With reference to Germany's economic prospects, Herr Hitler said that within two years Germany would make herself independent of imported cotton, wool and other fundamental raw materials.

He said it was for other nations to decide whether it was to their interest that Germany should cease to be an international buyer as well as seller.

"Three things," he said, "are requisite to world economic recovery, namely, maintenance of peace, the existence of strong, well-organized governments in every country, and the necessary energy to tackle world problems as a whole.

"Germany is ready to cooperate with other nations to this end if they will work with us."

The Prize-winning Prize Winner

During 1933 A. S. Pirie of Detroit won a contest prize an average of every five days, winning 73 prizes during the year for a total value of $1,640.00. This participation was in contest of almost every kind—newspaper, magazine, radio, or direct solicitation.

Of the 73 prizes, the principal ones were: $1,000 in the Household Finance Contest, 10 prizes of $25 each, a $105 radio, $100 in a cigar contest, and various others ranging from $1 to $10 as well as baskets of groceries, gas coupons, paint, theatre tickets, etc.

The "Contest" Magazine rates Mr. Pirie as one of the leading winners of the country.

Good For Nothing

Section 1200 of the Revenue Act of 1924 provided a 25 per cent reduction in the Federal Income Tax for 1923. Taxpayers who had already paid part of the 1923 Income Tax according to the original scale, became entitled to a refund of 25 per cent on their payments, and local federal collectors were instructed to this effect. In the case in question, the taxpayer does not seem to have been entitled to a refund and so he became the beneficiary of a government check for no dollars and no cents.

Chocolate Beats Brown On Points

Cuban Gains Decisive Victory In Debut As Lightweight At Coney Island

Kid Chocolate, former world's featherweight champion, made his first start in the lightweight division recently at the Coney Island Velodrome, and pounded out an eight-round decision over Buster Brown of Baltimore, says the New York Times.

About 6,000 persons saw the Cuban boxer outpoint his rival by a decisive margin, scoring repeatedly with left hooks and right crosses. The Cuban, who, at 132, spotted Brown eight and a half pounds, led all the way. The bout was finished in the rain, which started in the sixth round.

In the semi-final, scheduled for eight rounds, Bobby Pacho, California battler, knocked out Jimmy Slavin, west side veteran, after 2:45 of the third round. Referee Pete Hartley intervened when it was evident that Slavin was completely outclassed. Pacho weighed 140 and Slavin 133½.

Another scheduled eight-rounder ended after 1:40 of the opening session, with Eddie Ran, 147, Poland, being declared the victor on a knockout over Jimmy Phillips, 147, New Jersey. Referee Hartley halted this battle when Phillips suffered a bad cut over his left eye.

Charley Bedami, Yorkville lightweight, weighing 133½, received the decision over Frankie Oben, 137½, Trinidad, in the first eight-rounder. A six-rounder between Johnny DeFoe, 126, west side, and Danny London, 128, Coney Island, resulted in a victory for the former.

In the four-round opener Cyril Joseph, 119¾, Harlem, outpointed Tony Passaro, 122, Brooklyn.

U.S. Housing Program Uses Private Capital

jobs, art work, and so on ad infinitum.

Two Divisions Planned

Broadly, the Federal Housing Administration will function in two divisions. The first will deal with the modernization of the 16,500,000 buildings now in need of repair. Operation of this division calls for a tremendous amount of work, and it should create immediate demands for huge advances of credit upon private financial institutions of every type. Such loans, under the Housing Act, will be placed on a parity with the best collateral loans of the highest liquidity that any bank ever had on its books.

The second division will be that dealing with mortgages. Because of its wide ramifications and necessity for the most careful preliminary planning it will not be ready to function until later. When it is it will enable private capital to make insured loans for the constructions of new houses and to refinance mortgages on existing properties on a similar basis, thus opening up an enormous field of opportunities for investors to utilize profitably and with the utmost of safety funds that would otherwise continue to lie idle.

Operations through the functioning of this division unquestionably will continue for years to come, thus providing safe and profitable employment for both capital and labor. If only partly successful it will mean prosperity for twenty years, or as long as the activities continue. That is no visionary statement. The combined program represents a far greater volume of work than was required to restore all the devastated regions of both France and Belgium.

Breaking a Blockade

The building industry continues in the doldrums from which other industries have emerged, chiefly because of the blockade of the mortgage-money market. This blockade is due quite naturally to the fear of loss and the need for liquidity on the part of lenders. The Housing Act will break this blockade by assuring safety in lending and providing the liquidity which good banking calls for.

It represents application of the practice of amortization to home building and home repair, with every precaution being taken against loading people with debts they cannot comfortably carry.

Loans for modernizations will be "character loans." They will be based solely on the character of the home owner, and his ability to repay out of his income. They will be made for work on all types of buildings—shops, factories, stores, as well as residential properties. These character loans will be procured from privately owned financial institutions, including commercial, savings and industrial banks, building and loan associations and finance companies.

Seabury Boomed For Governor Of New York State

Republican Leaders To Sound Party On Nomination Of Independent Democrat

Prominent up-State Republicans have asked W. Kingsland Macy, Republican State Chairman, to sound out party leaders throughout the State on the advisability of nominating Samuel Seabury for Governor, it was learned yesterday, states the August 6 issue of the New York Times. Mr. Seabury is an independent Democrat. His nomination by the Republican party, an unprecedented action, would inaugurate a Fusion movement in the State.

Up to date, Mr. Macy has not committed himself publicly to the nomination of Mr. Seabury. It is believed, however, that he is inclined to favor it on the ground that none of the Republicans mentioned for the nomination would have as good a chance of defeating Governor Lehman, who is expected to be a candidate for re-election.

Mr. Macy, by his support of Mr. Seabury, played a large part in bringing about the nomination of Mayor LaGuardia in the successful New York City Fusion movement last year. Mr. Seabury's disclosures of Tammany misrule form the basis of the demand for extension of the Fusion movement and his nomination for Governor by the Republican State Convention.

Some of the Sponsors

Among those who have urged Mr. Macy to take steps to bring about Statewide Fusion with Mr. Seabury as the nominee for Governor are H. C. Mandeville of Elmira, for many years a member of the State Committee from Chemung County, and Edward Harris, leading lawyer of Rochester, who is allied with what is known as the Eastman good government group in that city.

Mr. Mandeville, who is allied politically with William H. Hill of Binghamton and former State Senator Clayton R. Lusk of Cortland, party leaders in the southern tier, wrote to Mr. Macy, saying:

"About six weeks ago I told you I believed Judge Seabury had shown himself above party in the service he has rendered the cause of good government. I asked you what you thought about his being on the Republican ticket as a candidate for Governor. You made no direct reply.

"May I ask what you have found as to the sentiment of leaders in the State in respect to this suggestion? The Republican party has a duty to the people of the State to provide a Governor who will give the best service to the people. Can this be better fulfilled than by nominating a man of his force and character?"

Mr. Harris wrote:

"We believe that the mounting costs of government in the last ten years justify the criticism of the organization that has been and is dominated by Tammany Hall. We believe that the situation is not unlike that in the City of New York and that as thorough a change as took place there is warranted in the State government.

"There are many able men within the Republican party who would make a splendid campaign and able executives of the State. We have, nevertheless, been led to the conclusion that the man who best typifies within the State the fight for good government is Samuel Seabury, who, while not a member of our party, has shown himself in accord with those principles for which the party stands in the cause of honest and sound local government, and has beyond all question, rendered a tremendous help in atttaining the ends."

Newspapers Back Boom

The suggestion to nominate Mr. Seabury has received a good deal of Republican newspaper support up-State.

"If fusion has been possible in New York City, why not in the State at large?" said an editorial in The Watertown Daily Times, of which Harold B. Johnson is editor. "The bitter factionalism of the Republicans might readily embrace it as the one real way of ending the old order in our New York State Republican organization. A Seabury in the Capitol would triumph gloriously at Albany, and what an interesting and inspiring spectacle it would be."

The Binghamton Press reported that Mr. Seabury's candidacy seemed to be gaining ground. The Ogdensburg Journal and The Rochester Democrat and Chronicle saw in the nomination of Mr. Seabury a chance of his carrying New York City or at least holding the Democratic plurality to a figure that would insure his election. The Utica Press declared that there was a dearth of qualified Republican candidates which might make the nomination of Mr. Seabury possible through sheer lack of Republican timber.

The Buffalo Times has quoted Surrogate Louis B. Hart of Erie County as favoring the nomination of Mr. Seabury.

Local Republican and Fusion leaders have been informed that the nomination of Mr. Seabury for Governor would increase greatly the chance of electing Controller Joseph D. McGoldrick.

Republican sponsors of the Seabury boom feel confident that he would be elected and will use this as their principal argument in urging his nomination. Should he receive the nomination, the rest of the ticket would be made up of Republicans.

Mr. Macy, who is on his way to Canada for a short vacation, is expected back in about ten days.

Karuizawa Notes

One of the prettiest weddings of the summer took place at 11:30 a.m. Thursday when Miss Mary Nelson Logan, daughter of Dr. Charles A. Logan of Nojiri and Karuizawa, became the bride of Mr. Delmer Myers Brown, instructor in the Fourth Higher school of Kanazawa.

The ceremony was solemnized in the garden of Rev. and Mrs. W. A. McIlwaine of Nojiri, in a setting of ancient shade trees and flowers which overlooked the lake.

Before the ceremony, Mr. H. Shiveley of Kyoto sang two solos. The wedding party was preceded to the improvised altar by little Mary Frazer Tremain and Kimmie Oldman. Miss Martha Logan, sister of the bride, was the maid of honor and Mr. Ronald Anderson was the Listman.

Dr. H. W. Myers, uncle of the bride, read the marriage ceremony and the bride was given in marriage by her father. The maid of honor wore a peach tinted crepe dress and carried a bouquet of gladioli of the same shade.

The bride's gown was a Paris model of Alice blue crepe fashioned with a long sweeping skirt, and trimmed with rhinestones. She carried white phlox, white asters and maiden hair fern tied with long white ribbons. Following the ceremony, the Rev. Percy Buchanan of Nojiri sang a solo. The wedding march was played by the Rev. Mark L. Tremain.

The bride was born in Japan and grew to girlhood here. She graduated, with Phi Beta Kappa honors, from Agnes Scott college, Decatur, Ga. Recently she has been teaching at Birmingham, Ala.

Lithuania Likely To Join Baltic States In Pact

Germany And Poland Are Being Urged To Join Eastern Locarno

Christian Science Monitor

MOSCOW, July 31—The Lithuanian Foreign Minister's visit to Moscow today is expected to provide the occasion for Lithuania's qualified adherence to the proposed Eastern Locarno, through the same formula approved by Latvia and Estonia, whose ministers here called on Mr. Maxim Litvinoff Sunday and presented identical notes as to their attitude.

It is noted here that by this formula the Baltic states approve the eastern European pact of mutual assistance only if both Germany and Poland adhere. This, it is believed, will tend to eliminate any question of encirclement of Germany or Russo-Polish friction over the Baltic states.

It is apparent from comments in the official press that Moscow has not abandoned the hope that not only Poland but also Germany will eventually enter the Eastern Locarno. The Communist Party newspaper Pravda today points out the need for haste in evolving a European peace system, as revealed by the recent Austrian events. Discussing the official Warsaw Gazetta Polska's comment that the matter requires thoughtful consideration and there is no need for hurry, Pravda supports the contrary view that "adventurous elements, armed with lighted torches, are abroad in Europe." Prompt conclusion of the Eastern European pact would provide the best means of averting the dangers of a conflagration, Pravda holds.

Fancy Driving

A truly remarkable dive, and one that probably cannot be duplicated, is the three-and-a-half somersault dive performed by Sam Howard of Houston, Texas, doing one backward and two and a half forward somersaults in the same dive. The dive covers two distinctly opposite balances—backward onto the springboard and rebounding into the forward spins.

Howard, who is a professional fancy diver, is able and willing to do this dive on request at any time, and gives daily exhibitions in the Houston pools.

Japan May Take Pardonable Pride In Its Submarines

In This Type Of Warships Nippon Has Developed Excellent Craft

By KAZUO SAGARA

Japan may well boast of her powerful submarines which have attracted so much attention of the other principal naval powers. It is after long years' training and hard study, however, that the Japanese submarines have been able to exceed those of other countries both in technique and discipline. In this connection, it must be specially mentioned that the present submarine tactics followed by the Japanese Navy has been worked out by Admiral Suetsugu, the present Commander-in-Chief of the Combined Fleet. Though the principal naval Powers except France and Japan apparently stand for the total abrogation of submarines at the coming naval conference, it is needless to say that Japan would never entertain such a proposal. The hostile attitude of the other principal naval Powers may testify to the fact that they do not take kindly to the Japanese submarines. It is probably three centuries ago that the underwater craft was first used as naval weapon. But it was only after the invention of the secondary electric battery that the practical value of the submarine at the naval battle was recognized by the naval Powers.

The vigorous and yet cruel activities of the German U-boats during the European War were also responsible for the appearance of the present powerful submarine which will figure most prominently on the agenda of the naval conference. In Japan the submarine has a great mission not only to prepare against the invasion of an enemy but also to attack the enemy in the sea battle. The submarine is indispensable to the Japanese Navy from the standpoint of national defence as well as from the strategical point of view.

The submarines may be divided into three categories, that is, the cruising submarine with a tonnage of 2,500, the fleet submarine with a tonnage of 1,500 and the coast-defence submarine with a tonnage of less than 1,000. Those submarines with a tonnage of more than 1,000 each is called the first-class submarine or I-type submarine while those with a tonnage of less than 1,000 each is called the second-class or Ro-type submarine.

Thirty-one submarines belong to the first-class submarines of I-type submarines in Japan. The five submarines including the I-1, the I-2, the I-3, the I-4, and the I-5 with a tonnage of 1,950 each develops a surface speed of 17 knots and is mounted with two 14 cm-guns, and six torpedo-tubes while the four submarines including the I-21, the I-22, the I-23 and the I-24 each has a tonnage of 1,142 and develops a surface speed of 14 knots, its armament consisting of one 14 cm-gun, and four torpedo-tubes. The I-51 with a tonnage of 1,390 develops a surface speed of 17 knots, its armament consisting of one 12 cm-gun, and eight torpedo-tubes while the I-52 with a tonnage of 1,390 is armed with one 12 cm-gun, and eight torpedo-tubes, developing a surface speed of 19 knots. The nine submarines including the I-53, the I-54, the I-55, the I-56, the I-57, the I-59, the I-60, and the I-63 with a tonnage of 1,635 each develops a surface speed of 19 knots, its armament consisting of one 12 cm-gun, and eight torpedo-tubes. The three submarines including the I-61, the I-62 and the I-64 with a tonnage of 1,635 is equipped with one 12 cm-gun, and six torpedo-tubes, developing a surface speed of 19 knots. The I-68 with a tonnage of 1,400 develops a surface speed of 20 knots, its armament consisting of one 12 cm-gun, and six torpedo-tubes.

The Japanese Navy has thirty-four second-class or Ro-type submarines, each of which is equipped with one gun. The two submarines including the Ro-17, and the Ro-18 each has a tonnage of 785 and is armed with six torpedo-tubes, developing a surface speed of 17 knots while the seven submarines including the Ro-19, the Ro-20, the Ro-21, the Ro-22, the Ro-23, the Ro-24, and the Ro-25 with a tonnage of 735 each develops a surface speed of 17 knots, its armament consisting of four torpedo-tubes. The three submarines including the Ro-26, the Ro-27 and the Ro-28 with a tonnage of 747 is mounted with four torpedo-tubes, developing a surface speed of 16 knots while the four submarines including the Ro-29, the Ro-30, the Ro-31, and the Ro-32 with a tonnage of 655 each develops a surface speed of 13 knots and is armed with four torpedo-tubes. Those submarines from the Ro-29 to the Ro-32 with a tonnage of 655 each develops a surface speed of 13 knots, its armament consisting of four torpedo-tubes. The five submarines including the Ro-51, the Ro-53, the Ro-54, the Ro-55, and the Ro-56 with a tonnage of 893 each develops a surface speed of 17 knots, its armament consisting of six torpedo-tubes except the Ro-53 which has only four torpedo-tubes. The three submarines including the Ro-57, the Ro-58, and the Ro-59 with a tonnage of 899 each develops a surface speed of 17 knots and is equipped with four torpedo-tubes, while the eight submarines including the Ro-60, the Ro-61, the Ro-62, the Ro-63, the Ro-64, the Ro-65, the Ro-66, the Ro-67 and the Ro-68 with a tonnage of 988 each is mounted with six torpedo-tubes, developing a surface speed of 16 knots. Finally we may compare the Japanese submarines with those of Britain, America and France. It must be noted that the signatory Powers of the London Treaty is prohibited from constructing more than three cruising submarines over 2,800 tons each. And yet France has a powerful cruising submarine named Surcouf with a tonnage of 2,800, a surface speed of 18 knots, and an armament of two 20.3 cm-guns, two 3.7 cm-anti-aircraft guns, four machine guns, and a hydroplane while the X-1 of Britain with a tonnage of 2,525 develops a surface speed of 19.5 knots and is armed with four 13 cm-guns, and six torpedo-tubes and the Nautilus of America with a tonnage of 2,730 develope a surface speed of 17 knots, its armament consisting of two 15 cm-guns, and six torpedo-tubes.

It is true that those powerful cruising submarines have a long cruising radius but their activity is limited as the number of the cruising submarines is limited as the result of the London Naval Conference.

This is the reason why the Japanese submarines outnumber those of other naval Powers not only in number and speed but also in capacity of submarines and crews. According to Jane's Naval Yearbook, the four Japanese submarines including the I-21, the I-22, the I-23 and the I-24 are simultaneously used as mine-layers. Powerful as those submarines reactions that will surely follws may be they cannot give full play to their activity without assistance from their depotships. The five submarine depotships including the Kanzaki, the Komabashi, the Jingei, the Chokei, and the Taigei supply the Japanese submarines with daily necessities.

The Jingei, and the Chokei each has a tonnage of 5,160, the Komabashi, a tonnage of 1,124, the Kanzaki, a tonnage of 9,570 and the Taigei, the latest one a tonnage of 10,000. Those submarine depotships also serve as the flagships of the submarine flotillas. In addition to those submarine depotships there is the Asahi, the training special service ship in Japan which is used as submarine salvage-ship.

American Views On Debt Issues Undergo Change

Opinion Swings Towards Final Settlement By Big Scaling Down

Rengo

WASHINGTON, July 26—A pronounced swing of informed American opinion in favour of a final settlement of the war debts owing from Europe, including a heavy scaling-down of the amounts, is becoming increasing discernible here and elsewhere in the United States.

The change of sentiment, while in sharp contrast with the tactics of militant anti-revisionists, particularly certain Congressmen and self-styled 'patriotic' newspapers, unmistakably reflects a new readiness in responsible quarters to examine in the cold light of reality the great economic issues at stake, and their bearing up the chief problem of the time—world recovery.

This has shown itself not only in declarations from high administrative quarters but also in the best-informed newspaper comment and in statements from industrial leaders and others.

Three factors have played an important part in bringing about this change of views:—

1. The Johnson Act (outlawing financial transactions with governments in default), which unexpectedly precipitated a wholesale suspension of payments on June 15.
2. Britain's clear-cut case, powerfully presented by the Government in its note to Washington of June 4; particularly those arguments showing debt payments to be in conflict with the aims of the New Deal.
3. Wider realisation, after the turn of the half-year, that war debts, in the present form, have become a lost cause.

There is a confident feeling here that the Roosevelt administration, despite the admonishments to 'defaulting' nationals handed out by the Secretary of State Cordell Hull, is sympathetically disposed to the revision theory. It is fully realised at the White House, however, that the state of Congressional and public opinion remains an obstacle at present.

Budget Director's View

No clearer evidence of the strength of revisionist sentiment in some quarters of official Washington has been forthcoming than the declaration, made apparently impromptu during a wireless discussion by the Director of the Budget, Mr. Lewis' Douglas.

Mr. Douglas, a "New Deal" conservative, said: "If foreign governments had paid their debts it would probably have intensified chaos in international currency, further paralysed international trade, diminished our profitable ability to produce and possibly increased the burden on the American taxpayer rather than diminished it."

The striking statement, which was followed by no retraction or official disclaimer, inspired the "New York Times, to the following comment, under the heading—Realism and the Debts."

"From so high an official of an administration that has been going through the gestures of asking for payment this is at least surprising. Perhaps Mr. Douglas would not have put it quite that way if he had had more time to think of the probable response of intransigent senators, but it undoubtedly expressed his real opinion.

"In 1926, it will be recalled, Secretary Mellon told a Congressional committee that 'the entire foreign debt is not worth as much to the American people in dollars and cents as a prosperous Europe as a customer,' but he contented himself with this mild hint.

"Mr. Douglas's statement seems to go further than that of any other high administration official since the question of repayment was first broached. Perhaps the day of candour and realism on the debts is dawning at last."

That all senators are not partisans of war-debt instransigence has been shown by various utterances.

Senator Glass, of Virginia, for instance, long powerful in American politics because of his intelligence and sincerity, declared: "I have always been in favour of adjustment of the war debts. We sold munitions to the Allies at unconscionable prices and it is now asked that they make substantial sacrifices to pay up. Already the British bear a burden of taxation so great that only Congressmen who suggested the same thing here would probably be lynched."

Senator Tydings, another of the more conservative members of the chamber, expressed his sentiments on the question by introducing a bill last session authorising President Roosevelt to negotiate with the debtor nations with a view to settlements "on a lump sum and final basis."

Congress still against revision

The temper of Congress as a whole, however, no doubt influenced to some extent by the forthcoming elections, may be gathered from the fact that it inserted a clause in the Tariff Act, prohibiting any construction of the law giving "authority to cancel or reduce in any manner any indebtedness of any foreign country to the United States."

As to the general public, it may be said that the people are being subjected to a gradual process of education on the realities of the debts problem—a process which is greatly retarded by the utterances of Congressional jingoists and by the anti-revision campaign of popular prints catering for the unsophisticated masses.

Meanwhile a steady stream of pro-revision statements has been forthcoming from thoughtful industrialists and others. Typical is that of Mr. James W. Hamilton, a noted business leader of St. Paul, Minnesota.

Mr. Hamilton writing in an American newspaper, declares:—

"England financed half of Europe in the Napoleonic wars. She wiped those vast sums off the slate and the nations began afresh. In a few decades England was more prosperous than ever.

"Today our people fear that we must pay the debt if Europe does not. In 1928 our national income was some ninety billions; last year it had fallen to about forty-five billions. The debt is probably the most serious question confronting not only our own people but the whole world. If we wiped it all out it would do for our generation what England's action did for that of the Napoleonic wars. If so, our income would rise by billions every year and out of our own prosperity the debt would be settled."

Such opinions as these are the "blackboard writings" from which the American public may be expected gradually to modify its attitude.

Today's Supermen Were Despised 20 Years Ago

Ramsay MacDonald was "An Unspeakable Fellow," Stalin A Terrorist And Mussolini A Hated Socialist

(The following excerpts from an article, written by Mr. P. W. Wilson for The New York Times on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the beginning of the Word War, show how today's supermen were mostly despised radicals a generation ago.)

Thus do we turn our eyes from the skyline of 1914 and glance, if only for a moment, to the parallel ridge of eminence in this present year, 1934. It requires an effort of the imagination to realize that the later supermen were all active in the world when the earlier supermen were shaken from the seats of the mighty.

Mention a Roosevelt in those days and everybody thought of Theodore. No other Roosevelt was conceivable. Yet in the Navy Department, there was a Franklin D. Roosevelt—already on the way.

In those hectic times a pacifist was held to be a traitor and probably an agent in foreign pay. Even Haldane was suspect, and as for Mrs. Asquith, had she not bidden adieu to Ambassador Lichnowsky as he departed from the German Embassy?

How was it possible at Lossiemouth to play golf with an "unspeakable fellow" like James Ramsay MacDonald? Yet the "unspeakable fellow," expelled from the golf club, was on his way.

In the Italy of August, 1914, it would have been hard indeed to spot the superman of the future, Benito Mussolini? Incredible. As an agitator, he was able enough, especially with his pen. But was Italy to be ruled by the son of a revolutionary blacksmith?

Had he not been imprisoned for ten days as an agrarian radical and placed under police supervision? Hard he not incited the people against the expedition to Tripoli and served five months in jail? Had he not been a leader during the Red Week of the immediately preceding June? Yet, the greatest of the dictators was on his way.

In Munich there was a young man in his twenty-sixth year. By birth he was an Austrian. He worked as a carpenter and an architect and he painted in water-colors. In the German Army he enlisted as a private and, with millions of others, he was sent to the western front as cannon fodder. Adolph Hitler—gassed and winning the Iron Cross—was on his way.

In Galicia there is a little place called Poronin. It is so small as to be omitted from the atlases. But in August, 1914, there happened to be a quaintly thick-set foreigner in Poronin with square shoulders and a goatee beard. Nobody had the least idea why he was staying there: Poronin was not so far from the Russian frontier and, thought the Austrian police, the stranger might be a czarist spy. In order to be on the safe side they expelled the unknown into Switzerland and thought no more about him. Lenin was on his way; and it happened that, in Vienna, there was another unexplained stranger who also left hurriedly for Switzerland. Trotsky was on his way.

There is a city in Northern Siberia called Turukhansk. It lies just outside the Arctic Circle, and there, in August, 1914, you might have seen a vigorous young man of 35. Only the police could remember how often he had been arrested and imprisoned and exiled, only to return again and resume his conspiracies. Joseph Vassarionovitch Stalin was on his way.

The Emperor Francis Joseph had many coachmen. One of them was called Masaryk, and Masaryk had a son. They wanted him to be a teacher, but, as a boy, he preferred the career of a locksmith and the blacksmith's forge. However, he surrendered later to erudition and even to politics. In August, 1914, Thomas Garriague Masaryk, fearless investigator of the darker Austrian diplomacy and now President of Czechoslovakia, was on his way.

At Warsaw there was a peculiar enthusiast called Pilsudski. A Polish noble by pedigree, he had the idea that Poles should fight for Poland. He organized, therefore, a private army of his own and threw in his lot with Austria against Russia. Later he changed sides. But, all the time, Pilsudski was on his way.

In the Turkish Legation at Sofia there was a military attache. Everyman's hand was against him and his hand was against everyman. But he knew all about defending the Dardanelles. Kemal was not yet Mustafa the Glorious. But he was on his way.

We look once more at the two skylines and wonder where will be the superman of 1934 when 1954 is the year to be written about. Does the present skyline bound a tableland of security? Or is it merely a ridge between two abysses? Can we see that we have left behind us the Grand Canyons of war and revolution which break into the continuities of civilization?

Why Storms Occur Told

Rengo

DURBAN, (Natal).—That the Sun, Moon and planets are responsible for earthquakes, hurricanes and other terrestial phenomena was the theory advanced by Captain C. S. Hewlett, F.R.G.S., Assistant Port Captain at Durban, before the local branch of the South African Astronomical Society at the Technical College.

"Sailors have a habit of wanting to know the why and wherefor of most things," said Captain Hewlett, "and this new theory of the relations of the planets to terrestial weather conditions is the work of a sailor, Captain A. J. Cooper, who started his researches as a result of being shipwrecked on three consecutive voyages."

"Solectrics," as Captain Hewlett called the new science, is closely related to weather forecasting by ordinary meteorological instruments, with the difference that whereas by ordinary means weather conditions can be predicted for only the next 24 hours or so, by Captain Cooper's method one can predict what to expect 12 months or more ahead. The lecturer warned his hearers not to confuse the new science with that of astrology.

"To form an electric circuit," said Captain Hewlett, "we must have a positive and a negative phase, and it is from these two forces that the theory is derived. The members of the solar family during the passage of their orbits reach positions when their 57½-degree or their 88-degree arcs will intercept, charging a certain spot with either a negative force or a positive solectric force. Should other planets be 57½ degrees of 88 degrees from these planets, extra force is put into that one spot.

"Therefore, when a relief force comes along, a balancing of the elements takes place, usually in the form of a wind storm, rain, lightning, earthquakes, volcanoes or other phenomena, according to the planets acting and their combinations.

"There arcs are continually passing over the Earth's surface, owing to its diurnal rotation, but they are of no effect unless they intersect, and then only at the point of intersection, or within a radius of a few degrees, three for the Sun and Moon and two for a planet."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Parliament

The British Parliament which has an unexcelled record of continuous legislation for the last 600 years is probably the most venerable institution extant. It consists of the King, the House of Lords and the House of Commons. But the King does not take part, in or attend the deliberations of either House. Ever since Charles I entered the House with an armed retinue to arrest 5 members on January 4, 1642, no King of England has ever been seen within the House of Commons. Charles I lost his head as a result of this violation.

Another real "Believe It or Not" that you can see daily in the "Odditorium" at the Century of Progress is Paul McWilliams who puts four golf balls in his mouth at the same time,—two in his cheeks and more on top of his tongue—and closes his mouth. McWilliams also gives an interesting demonstration of "throat music" when he plays tunes by tapping his windpipe with wooden spoons.

'Come To Britain' Movement Brings Many To England

£12,000,000 Expected To Be Spent By Foreign Tourists In Year

Rengo

LONDON, July 11—The "Come to Britain" movement, instituted a few years ago to induce foreigners to visit Britain, is this year meeting with a striking response and it is estimated that visitors from abroad will spend something like £12,000,000 in this country by the end of the holiday season.

There are probably more foreign visitors in England at the present time than in all the other European countries put together.

The reason for this "invasion" may be summarised:—

1. The comparative cheapness of Great Britain since foreign exchanges, with few exceptions are against us.
2. The unusually fine summer.
3. Special attractions—such as Wimbledon tennis tournament and the Test matches.

Commander Studd, the son of Sir Kynaston Studd, formerly Lord Mayor of London, who is a travel expert, told a REUTER reporter of foreigner's preferences and difficulties in this country.

A matter of concern to "day trippers" to Folkstone is the price of beer. Frenchmen cannot understand why it costs so much.

Other trippers, with only a few hours to spare, visit Canterbury, as the nearest typically English town.

"Colonials coming over usually buy a car, take a trip round the country in it, sell it again and go home", he added.

"The places visitors from everywhere like are the Shakespeare country, Oxford, Devonshire and Scotland. Americans particularly like to see Plymouth, where the Pilgrim Fathers set sail for the New World.

Perhaps most visitors come from America and then—in order of numbers—from Germay (despite the adverse rate of exchange), France, Holland, Scandinavia and Switzerland.

One of the things Continental visitors did not like was the good old British breakfast, porridge, bacon and eggs and a pot of tea.

"Coffee and rolls" is the breakfast programme on the Continent and hotels here have now realised this and are making their guests thoroughly at home from the moment the day begins.

A number of Australian visitors have come for the Test matches and many South Africans are also here to see the cricket.

In the first five months of this year 7,000 more foreign visitors had arrived here than in the same period last year.

Did You Know There Were 220 Different Colors And Shades?

LONDON—When the British Colour Council came into being the declared aims and objects included the placing of colour determination for the British Empire in British hands and the provision of standard names for colours for clearness' sake. Members were promised that among the services offered would be the free issue of such a standard range of colours, to be distinct from the seasonal fashion ranges and to be comprised of those colours which are in constant demand.

The promise has been fulfilled by the production of the British Colour Council Dictionary of Colour Standards, consisting of two volumes, one showing 220 colours presented on pure silk ribbon and named, numbered, and coded, and the other giving the history of each colour, the various names by which each has previously been known, and the authority for standardization. The dictionary is primarily intended for industrial and commercial reference, but it would delight the artist or the lover of appropriate words by its spread of fascinating colour tones and the imagery that has been brought to their naming. Cyclamen pink, nettle grey, battleship grey, bee-eater blue, Chartreuse green, buttercup, and banana may be given as a random selection from the list.

Three Classes

The colours, other than those decided on as spectrum colours, fall into three classes—those which can be matched to definitely existing standards, such as Wedgwood blue or Post Office red; those which can be matched to the average of a number of samples, whether animal, vegetable, or mineral, such as squirrel, carrot, and sapphire; and those of which the colour sensation attributed to a definite colour name shows a very wide divergence of opinion, such as sky blue, saxe blue, and old rose. It is stated that the third of these classes was the most difficult to deal with, as in some cases names still regarded as standard were first used hundreds of years ago and the number of hues attributed to the same colour name increased, for various reasons, until the original significance was lost. The variety of specimens received for each colour was astounding: there were, for instance, 80 different sky blues, 60 different whites, and 40 different blacks.

The council state that a great deal of misunderstanding on certain points can now be cleared up. There is no separate and distinct set of colours for each industry, and it is possible to match any product from silk ribbon. The 220 colours contained in the dictionary have been adopted by the British Standards Institution and, through the director of that institute, have been put forward for acceptance to the standardizing bodies in the British Colonies and Dominions.

A number of important points are associated with the dictionary. The range was drawn up on a system which makes it practicable as a definite colour language for all stages of colour education and in all colour-using industries. The range is so created that it can, if necessary, be enlarged to a regular graduated range. The colours have been measured scientifically so that the original standard can be permanently preserved.

Representatives of industry were consulted in order that the range should be sufficiently comprehensive for each colour-using industry to select ranges of colours technically possible to reproduce. When and where possible, and if necessary, colours already standardized were incorporated after their history had been investigated.

It is stated to be practically certain that the range will be accepted by the Empire standardizing authorities as agreed at the Ottawa Conference.

Republicans Cited Backing New Deal

Byrns Points To 47 Out Of 115 Voting For It In 14 Of The 27 Roll-Calls On Its Measures

Republican support of administration measures in Congress was cited today by Representative Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee, Democratic leader in the House and chairman of the party's National Congressional Committee, in declaring that Henry P. Fletcher, chairman of the Republican National Committee, could not make the New Deal a chief issue in the Congressional campaign, says the New York Times.

"Had Chairman Fletcher taken the precaution to first analyze the votes cast by members of his party in the House during the Seventy-third Congress he might not have been so caustic in his criticism of the New Deal," Mr. Byrns said.

Mr. Byrns then gave results of an analysis by his committee of the extra and regular sessions showing that of the 115 Republican members of the House forty-seven, or eleven less than a majority, voted against the administration in fourteen roll-calls of the twenty-seven on measures "which collectively constitute the legislation required to make the New Deal effective."

"Indeed there were eighteen Republicans who by their affirmative votes approved a majority of those measures," Mr. Byrns added, "and this number undoubtedly would have been much greater had the leaders of that party not injected partisanship into their appeals during the closing days of the refular session."

By the "Fletcher yardstick," Mr. Byrns termed Representatives Louis T. McFadden of Pennsylvania and Frank R. Reid of Illinois "the outstanding Republicans of the House."

Mr. McFaden, a sharp critic of President Hoover in the Seventy-second Congress, was credited with only three pro-administration votes in the Seventy-third, while "twenty-one times his vote was recorded in opposition and on three roll-calls his vote was not recorded."

Mr. Reid was listed as voting with the administration only three times and against it only twice, "being unrecorded on twenty-two of the twenty-seven roll-calls."

Remarking that "most of the opposition to the Roosevelt program did not come from the old and tried Republican leaders but rather from the newer, less experienced even if more vocal members," Mr. Byrns said that Representative Bertrand H. Snell of New York, Republican floor leader, voted with the administration in nine roll-calls and against it in thirteen.

He added that Representative Chester Bolton of Ohio, chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee, voted with the administration ten times.

Instructions Sent To Dr. Nagaoka

Officials Of Foreign, Finance, And Commerce Ministries Discuss Situation

Instructions to Dr. Haruichi Nagaoka, Japan's delegate to the Batavia Trade Parley, in connection with the notification of Dr. Meyer Ranneft, Dutch delegate, to Dr. Nagaoka that the Dutch East Indies Government is contemplating the imposition of restrictions upon imports of various goods amounting to 52 kinds, are understood to have been despatched following the joint conference of high officials of the four Ministries at the Foreign Office on Friday.

High officials of the Foreign, Finance, Commerce and Industry and Communications Minstries met in conference at the Foreign Office at 11:30 a.m. to decide on the instructions to be despatched to Dr. Nagaoka. After detailed reports by Mr. Kurusu, Chief of the Trade Bureau of the Gaimusho, on the results of the interviews which took place on August 28 and 29 between Dr. Nagaoka and Dr. Ranneff at Batavia, the conferees are said to have decided on the instructions to be sent to Dr. Nagaoka.

Reich Law To Reduce Hereditary Diseases

sterilization is too late to be effective.

Epilepsy is another scheduled disease which in certain forms follows simple Mendelian rules of heredity. It is generally agreed that about one-half of the cases are hereditary, the rest being due to accidental injuries which are not as a rule transmitted. A form of epilepsy associated with muscular convulsions is due to a simple recessive gene and many epileptics are born of normal healthy parents, both of whom are carriers of the disorder.

The sterilization of epileptics according to the German plan will no doubt reduce the frequency of occurrence of the disorder in future generations, but the disease will never be entirely exterminated while it is borne by healthy carriers. Disease due to simple recessive genes are only slowly reduced by sterilization, and as time goes on the process of reduction becomes slower and slower, since the more they are reduced the less frequently can the genes meet to produce the disease and the less likely are the diseases to be completely eradicated.

Two groups of mental disorders, scheduled in the Gelman act, do not follow simple Mendelian rules in their heredity. These are manic-depressive insanity and dementia praecox, the latter being now more generally known as schizophrenia. It is generally agreed that about 80 per cent of the former and 50 per cent of the latter cases are hereditary, the remainder being due to various environmental causes or, perhaps more precisely, occasions.

Insanity Genes

So far genetical research has not been able to reveal the precise nature of the genes concerned. The data show that about one-half of the offspring of a manic-depressive parent are affected, all the offspring are affected, but one-half of them only mildly. Healthy parents produce about 5 per cent of affected offspring. In schizophrenia about one-half of the offspring of an affected parent are affected, in different degrees. If both parents are affected, about 80 per cent of the offspring are affected, in different degrees. Healthy parents produce about 7 per cent affected.

From these facts it is evident that the sterilization of affected individual would reduce the number of hereditary cases of these mental disorders considerably, although it would not stamp them out entirely owing to the healthy carriers. In these diseases, however, the percentage of recorded healthy carriers is less than usual.

It is interesting to note that the problem of the sacrifice of normals by sterilizing the affected is not so acute in the case of mental disorders as it is with mental defects. In the case of mental disorders the number of normals lost to the community would be only about equal to the number of affected.

Hereditary Defects

The three remaining groups of the German schedule include hereditary blindness, hereditary deafness and severe hereditary physical abnormalities and deformities.

The clinical and genetical forms of hereditary blindness and deafness are exceedingly numerous and complicated. Some of these behave in hereditary as simple dominants (over normal), some as simple recessives (to normal) while others are due to more than one dominant and recessive gene. Others again, like cataract and night-blindness, behave as dominants in one group of families and recessives in others; while others, like red-green color-blindness, are sex-linked, appearing chiefly in males but with female carriers of the defect.

It is evident that sterilization will have a different effect in each of these typical cases. In those cases in which the disease behave as a simple dominant, sterilization will not only prevent the spread of the disease entirely, except for the rare appearance of original mutations and, in cases like cataract, where the onset of the disease is too late in life for sterilization to be effective.

In cases where the disease is a simple recessive, sterilization of the affected will prevent the spread of the disease and thus reduce the incidence considerably, but the reduction will be so slow that the disease will never be completely stamped out owing to the presence of healthy carriers in the poulation.

Sex-Linked Diseases

In case of sex-linked diseases where the gene is located in the sex chromosome, if the gene is dominant the sterlization of affected individuals will rapidly reduce the frequency of occurrence of the disease, while, if it is recessive, sterilization will reduce the incidence of the disease twice as rapidly as in the case of a simple recessive. There is therefore a good case for the sterilization of all individuals affected with diseases that are sex-linked, such as red-green color-blindness, certain forms of night blindness, microphthalmia and Leber's disease (atrophy of the optic nerve), the eye defect known as megalocornea and, above all, the distressing and difficult disease haemophilia.

In certain forms of deafness due to the coming together of two complementary dominant genes, sterilization would be less effective and would reduce the incidence at about the same rate and to the same extent as in the case of a simple recessive character.

With regard to the last group in the German schedule, which includes physical defects and malformations, the majority of these are due apparently to a simple dominant gene which is handed on from parent to offspring and is usually directly expressed in one-half of the children of either sex. In such cases the sterilization of the affected should stamp out these diseases quickly. These diseases are, however, comparatively rare, and their prevention by sterilization would involve the loss to the community of an equal number of healthy and genetically untainted individuals.

Finally although the object of the German sterilization law will not be completely attained, there is no doubt that the German Government will be able to reduce considerably the frequency of all the scheduled diseases provided that the law is carefully administered and rigidly enforced.

Hollywood Stars Said To Back Reds

Los Angeles Police Captain, A Congressional Inquiry Witness, Makes Charge

A charge that large contributions to the Communist party are coming from noted Hollywood film players was made in Los Angeles recently by Police Captain William F. Hynes as he emerged from a closed Congressional hearing on Communist activities, says a dispatch to the New York Times.

Captain Hynes, of the Los Angeles police intelligence service, did not mention the alleged filmland contributors by name. He was one of several witnesses called before the hearing, which was closed to the public to avert "international complications."

Meanwhile Dr. George Gyssling, German Vice Consul at Los Angles, who declined to testify at the inquiry without the approval of the German Embassy in Washington, said he had received at least twelve anonymous telephone threats against the lives of himself and family in the last few weeks. He expressed the belief that the callers were "simply fanatics," and said he did not deem it necessary to inform the police.

Laid Before the Movie Studios

"We have taken the matter of the financial support to the Communist movement from stars up with their studios," said Captain Hynes. "The studios have promised to cooperate with us."

Declaring he was not asked to disclose the names of the actors who contributed financially to the radical movement, he added that he had the names available to "present at the proper time." Some of the stars were described as foreign born and others as native Americans.

"Most of those who have contributed thousands of dollars in advance the Red cause in America believe they are guided by philanthropy," the police captain continued. "While there is no definite plan on foot to attempt to boycott pictures of those who have contributed to the Communist cause, drastic action may be necessary.

"Most of those who have given money in large sums were once poor persons. They apparently feel, now that they are in the big money, that they should do something to help out the poor man. However, if you were to take away their salaries, they'd probably feel differently about it."

After emerging from the closed session, Captain Hynes said he had recommended national legislation to outlaw the Communist party.

Captain Hynes estimated that there were 4,000 to 4,500 dues-paying members of the Communist party in California, 2,000 of them in Los Angeles. He said there were between 20,000 and 25,000 Communist "sympathizers" in the city. The Communist Internationale, he declared, disbursed $672,000 in the United States in 1930 to finance propaganda. Every member of the Communist party here had been assessed 50 cents toward establishing "an illegal Communist press" in Germany, he asserted.

Counsel Urges Closed Hearing

Testimony that an alleged pro-Nazi organization, known as the Silver Shirts of San Diego, had been plotting to overthrow the United States Government and had obtained rifles and ammunition from American military sources preceded the inquiry into Communist activities.

The protection of witnesses and those mentioned in testimony against possible violence also was advanced as a consideration in the decision to make the hearing on Communist activities a secret affair.

Volney Mooney, counsel for the Congressional Subcommittee on un-American Activities, disclosed the decision to hold a secret hearing.

Urging the closing of the doors, Mr. Mooney said the testimony "would never be made public" because it was "so poisonous that international complications might result."

After debating the matter, the subcommittee, headed by Representative Kramer of California, followed Mr. Mr. Mooney's recommendation.

Three Communists Appear

Witnesses present at the time were Captain Hynes and Miss Margaret Kerr, secretary-manager of the Better American Federation.

Miss Kerr said before she entered the hearing room that her appearance probably would be utilized to establish the nature of general Communist activities in this area.

Subpoenas were issued for the appearance of three Communists, but all appeared voluntarily, saying they were willing and ready to testify.

Those who appeared were Meyer Baylin, educational director of the Communist party in the Los Angeles district; Lawrence Ross, Communist candidate for Congress and once a candidate for Mayor of Los Angeles, and Pettis Perry, Negro, a Communist candidate for Lieutenant Governor.

Representative Kramer, a Democrat seeking re-election this Fall, is chairman of a subcommittee of three investigating un-American activities. He was the only one of the three present at the hearing. He represents the Hollywood district.

The author, an official of the Foreign Office, has sought in his brochure "The Secret of Japan's Trade Expansion" to refute the charges often overheard regarding "Japan's unfair competition," when he was Vice-Consul in London between 1929 and 1933.

The accusation of dumping, unfair subsidies and social dumping is refuted by the author and his explanations given: Taking the figures supplied by the Social Bureau of the Department of Home Affairs, Mr. Asahi, shows that the working hours per diem in 1922 were 11 and 8:30 hours in 1933. Yet the graph for industrial production and employment, indicates in general the decrease in labor costs.

The author wonders if one can imagine Japan financing "dumping" amounting to ¥2,000,000,000 (annually) with a subsidy of ¥100,000 allowed 50 export associations for the year of 1934.

As for shipping subsidies, with the yen at par the comparative ratios with the index of 100 for Japan, are France 218, Italy 333 and the United States 582. At the present rate of exchange the contrasts are even greater.

The volume is well written, with restraint and the points clearly presented. The book should be placed in the hands of every editorial writer abroad who may have the occasion to write about Japan's Trade expansion.

Mitchell Charged With Retarding US Air Corps

lowing in fast transports. The commanding general can assemble any group of units he wishes for training, shift them from Maine to California and back to the Gulf if he likes. In short, he can keep them in condition to go anywhere at any time and meet an enemy. Such an air force will command the respect of any nation.

The War Department's new control of the Air Corps is further evidenced by its recently initiated system of purchasing aircraft. This should insure greater competition—a competition of brains rather than dollars—with a consequent improvement in planes. It will be a competition of completed airplanes rather than of designs on paper. Actual performance will be the deciding factor rather than some engineer's opinion while still on paper, as has been the case many times in the past, thereby retarding progress. The fighting units that have to fly the planes should have the final acceptance of a new type. The Army engineers should merely make certain that planes are strong and airworthy, but not have the power to accept or reject. They should also do original research work and assemble data for the use of the manufacturers of military aircraft.

Latest Combat Planes Unsuitable

As a result of the old system perhaps three-fourths of our latest combat planes are unsuitable for war use because they are not capable of flying in and out of small wartime air fields at the front. They either land too fast or take off too slowly. In the event of war they will kill more of our pilots than the enemy will unless something radical is done.

Briefly, most of the Air Corps ills can be cured by administrative measures from within the War Department and a little executive action by the President. For the few remaining problems Congressional action will be needed.

Much progress has been made in the last few weeks. If we can judge the future by the immediate past the Army Air Corps will soon come into its own with an aggressive program and some real co-operation, so that the sacrifice of twelve Army mail pilots will not have been in vain. For it was their deaths that brought the demand for drastic action as no amount of oratory could have done.

cussions. He would speak for many of the elements formerly represented by Papen as well as the army. His appointment would be taken as proof that Hitler put his chief reliance on the reactionary right.

This undoubtedly is one of the problems on which Herr Hitler has been meditating in his Bavarian retreat as he makes ready for the coming Nazi party conference. It will fully test his powers of leadership.

In fact, the very question of his mastery will arise. Goering, Premier of Prussia and commander of police, secret, local and State, is a formidable person who showed in the recent purging he could act quickly and ruthlessly. He has indicated very strongly that he wants second place in the dictatorship. Hitler might feel constrained to grant the wish, unless he decides the Reichswehr would serve him better.

French Cabinet Faces Crisis In October Sessions

Democracy May Be Confronted With Severe Test If Doumergue Falls

Now that the 600 deputies have gone on vacations, political prognosticators in Paris are beginning to formulate opinions as to what will happen after the Chamber reconvenes late in October and Gaston Doumergue's truce cabinet enters its most critical days, comments Leland Stowe, Paris correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune.

It is recognized everywhere that French democracy is extremely likely to be confronted with the most serious test since before the war. This test is expected to come at any moment during the autumn and winter sessions of Parliament, says Mr. Stowe whose article follow:

Accordingly, several questions have already been posed. One is: Can France achieve a stronger-disciplined, more centralized and reformed parliamentary order without departing from the Third Republic's constitutional framework? Another is. Can Doumergue's National Union government possibly last throughout the winter?

Changes Held Necessary

While most Frenchmen still ardently hope for governmental reform within a strictly preserved democratic state, the realization that changes must be inaugurated, whether with friction or without it is now keenly felt in all parties. For this reason it is important to consider what some of the best informed French political observers expect to happen here between October and next April.

One is compelled to remember that even the shrewdest political weather men can be easily mistaken in France. Nevertheless, it is true that many experienced French readers of the political barometer today prophesy swift difficulties for the Doumergue Cabinet when the Chamber reopens, and declare that little short of a miraculous demonstration of strength will permit Doumergue to remain in office until the spring.

As things now stand, some admit that Doumergue is apt to fall between November and January. They say the national truce was already broken in spirit by Andre Tardieu's attack on Camille Chautemps two weeks ago, and that an actual rift must be expected to follow. If this view proves correct, what does it mean? It means that Doumergue's resignation probably would drive President Albert LeBrun into seeking the Senate's approval to dissolve Parliment and set a date for the new elections.

New Leader Not Available

Whenever Doumergue goes, dissolution appears almost inevitable because there is no other political leader who could be counted on to from a stable government, and as one Frenchman has said, a series of brief weak governments next winter would endanger the very foundations of France's democratic regime.

But in the current circumstances, new elections could not fail to unleash a bitter battle for survival and supremacy between the extreme Right and the extreme Left parties, the quasi-Fascists and the anti-Fascists. These factions were already rioting, with occasional loss of life, last spring, and in an electoral struggle conflict could not fail to increase, just as it did among the Socialists, Communists, Nazis and Nationalists in Germany. What the outcome of such an electoral clash would be is entirely unpredictable at the present moment. That the possibility of its occurrence looms larger cannot be denied.

Doumergue Strives for Delay

There is still time for Doumergue to do what he will surely do: make a gallant effort to preserve his truce government intact and so postpone the fateful necessity of dissolving Parliment and pushing harassed and discontented Frenchmen into the national elections just when all Europe is in a delicate state of unrest. But many Frenchmen who warmly support Doumergue feel that the odds against him are too great and his advanced age is a serious handicap to his outriding the parliamentary storms ahead.

If dissolution and the new elections do come some time next winter, one factor must not be overlooked. This is that a single hasty or stupid act by Chancellor Adolf Hitler might always be sufficient to win the next elections for the French right-wing Nationalists. On the other hand, if Hitler were to be wisely silent or conciliatory, then the fear of war and the average Frenchman's deep desire for peace might possibly swing the elections for the Left parties.

As much as this may sound like long-range conjecturing, these are all parts of the political picture which it is entirely possible for France to present in another few months. At any rate, these are some of the things which Frenchmen are wondering about and worrying about beneath the artificial calm of August's political picture.

6,000 Gangsters On Federal Lists

Purvis In Washington Helps Map The Government Drive Against 'Bad Men'

The Department of Justice has compiled a list of 6,000 known gangsters and racketeers, most of them still at large, whom it intends to pursue until they have been put in prison or quit their careers of crime, says The New York Times.

The existence of such a list was confirmed by William Stanley, Acting Attorney General, incidental to the visit to Washington of Melvyn H. Purvis, chief of the Chicago Bureau of the Division of Investigation, who arrived recently to make a personal report on the killing of John Dillinger.

Mr. Stanley scouted the idea that any one had taken Dillinger's place as "Criminal No. 1" of the United States, or even that Dillinger had occupied that position. He said that on the growing list of 6,000 "bad men" each one was "Class 1 criminal" as far as the department was concerned.

Mr. Purvis's conference will deal also with the future campaign against these "bad men." The next immediate task before the Chicago chief and his staff is to round up the remaining members of the Dillinger gang, each of whom has a record of his own.

Upon the advice of Mr. Purvis officials guarded carefully the source of the tip that led to Dillinger's apprehension, information as to what agent did the fatal shooting and as to the women companions of the desperado.

Mr. Purvis's arrival was a signal for a holiday about the offices of the Acting Attorney General and J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the Division of Investigation. Seated in Mr. Stanleys office, he retold in a calm, matter-of-fact manner the story of the climax of the greatest man hunt in recent years.

While the Division of Investigation was making Mr. Purvis's visit an occasion for a redeclaration of war on the criminal element, it took no little encouragement from a compilation of its record for the fiscal year ended June 30. In that period 2,531 convictions were obtained in cases handled by agents of the division, which is 93.81 of all cases brought to trial in the twelve months.

Sentences imposed in cases handled by the division totaled 11 life, 5,073 years; suspended sentences totalled 1,012 years; probationary sentences totaled 2,501 years, and fines totaled $772,839.73.

During the year 928 Federal fugitives from justice were found by special agents. In addition, 4,356 fugitives from justice were found through finger print work performed by the Identification Unit, making a total of 5,284 fugitives found during the year.

During the year, 2,302 stolen motor vehicles valued at $910,024 were recovered.

Age Of Man Is Estimated To Be 16,000,000 Yrs.

Oxford Zoologist Tells Of Monkey-Blood Test That Pushes Origin Back

The discovery that blood serum of Old World monkeys is more closely related to man's than to that of New World monkeys was announced today by Dr. Solly Zuckerman, Oxford zoologist, who has just completed two years of research work at Yale University, says the New York Times.

The announcement has bearing on the riddle of evolution, for it confirms the belief that man is enormously older than had been supposed. Like the recent discovery in East Africa, it tends to push man's beginnings on earth far back—perhaps to the Oligocene era (estimated at more than 16,000,000 years ago).

Dr. Zuckerman briefly described his new findings today during a discussion at the Congress of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences, which is being attended by 1,000 delegates from forty-two countries.

Scientists have known that anthropoid apes of the Old World, such as chimpanzees, have the same groups of blood cells as man and that in this respect apes differ from Old World and New World monkeys. Now Dr. Zuckerman has found the additional fact that serum proteins in the blood of Old World apes and monkeys are related to each other and to man's, but not to those of New World monkeys.

Remote Split Is Seen

Such a sharp cleavage suggests that the whole Old World group split off in incredibly distant times from a common stock, which presumably also gave origin to the New World monkeys. It also suggests, according to Dr. Zuckerman, that independent human, or human-like, stock branched from the apes very early in geological time.

The anthropologists attending the congress spent two hours today trying to prove that blood groupings threw light on the origins and relationships of living human races. But the attempt was a failure, for blood groups discussed were too small to be very significant.

J. B. S. Haldane, noted British biologist, declared at the end of the discussion that "the blood groupings in any population are hardly more important as a test of race than is cranial capacity." Apparently bigger and better blood groupings are needed before the anthropologists can make convincing use of them.

It was a far cry from primitive man to baby talk, yet in another section of the conference Professor Douglas Guthrie of Edinburgh University linked the two. When baby asks "What's dat?" he is simply obeying a primitive impulse, Professor Guthrie declared.

"There is distinguishable a stage at which a child finds special satisfaction in merely dicovering and applying correctly the names of objects," he said. "Probably there is something here of the primitive 'name magic.' A child, like a savage, has a dim feeling that naming an object gives him some sort of power over it."

Other Theories Discussed

Professor Guthrie mentioned other theories to account for primitive speech, including the "bow-wow" theory, whereby a baby imitates sounds he has heard. Then he told of King James IV's experiment to learn what the original language of the human race was.

"King James, a person of a rather inquiring turn of mind, marooned two infants on an island in the Firth of Forth in charge of a deaf and dumb nurse," said Professor Guthrie. "The result, as one Scottish historian tells us, was that they began to speak very good Hebrew. But Sir Walter Scott, in commenting on the incident, said it was more likely that the children were screaming like their dumb nurse or bleating like goats or sheep."

The "disastrous" impact of Western ideas upon Oriental peoples was discussed by Arnold J. Toynbee, noted historian, before the members of the psychology section.

"The historians of the future will select as the greatest event of the twentieth century not any of the political upheaval which fill our newspapers," said Mr. Toynbee, "but the tremendous impact of Western culture upon the East.

"Culture is refracted in transmission like a white light passing through a crystal. Some of the colors of the spectrum pass through; others do not. Likewise, one element of foreign culture always penetrates first and others follow.

"The impact of Western ideas has been especially disastrous for the mixed populations in the Near East, who have been led by the prestige of Western Europe to substitute nationalism for their own institutions and have been incited to sort themselves out geographically. The result has been deadly new antagonisms."

Dollfuss As Seen By German Press

Dr. Walther Schmitt Attacks Late Chancellor In The Volkischer Beobachter

The Volkischer Beobachter yesterday contained an illuminating editorial by Dr. Walther Schmitt, which sums up the official Nazi attitude towards Dollfuss as it has been steadily presented to the German public for the past eighteen months, says an article in the Observer, London journal, in an article from Berlin dated July 28.

"A man was killed," says Dr. Schmitt, "who took it upon himself to form the destiny of the Austrian people, and actually, in the conflict round his Government system, a portion of Austria's destiny is fulfilled. But not in the manner desired by Dollfuss and his friends."

The fight did not reveal the Christian-Socialist Chancellor, says the editorial, as a model for his people, whose activities for Austria would point the way to a brighter future. In this fight round the Dollfus System deep popular passion and true human values expressed themselves only in the opposition, coming from the people themselves who "fought a defensive action against Dollfuss and his helpers."

"For years the name of this Chancellor has been a symbol." The writer then gives a list of the crimes committed by Dr. Dollfuss, and goes on to say that "while in the valleys the horrors of this system terrorised a whole population, the fire of freedom, lit by peasant boys and workers at the risk of their lives, flamed in the clear mountain nights of Austria—symbol of an eternal unbroken loyalty and strength. That was what broke the political Dollfuss even before his death."

Dollfuss is described as a man who did not understand his times, dedicating his life to the perpetuation of a medieval State form. He could not cope with the real conviction of the people over whom he ruled, and because he could not master them became "a brutal, despotic politician, who sacrificed everyone to his own aims.

"Despite all the terrible sacrifice of blood, Dollfuss did not destroy Marxism. Neither did he create a new authoritative State." As the "decent people" refused to follow Dollfuss, says the writer, he gave State power to thousands of the morally worst subjects. The most doubtful persons were able to achieve political power through him."

El Lagarto Wins Speedboat Title

The Gold Cup Goes To George Rei's Leaping Lizard Of Lake George

By EVERETT B. MORRIS

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

BOLTON LANDING, N. Y., Aug. 4.—The Gold Cup, oldest and most cherished of American speedboat racing trophies, will remain in the lair of the Leaping Lizard of Lake George for another year, a gleaming symbol of the continued supremacy of the oldest boat in the class over her younger, more lively, but less sprightly rivals.

El Lagarto, as ugly as the Spanish reptile for which she is named, and just as durable and tenacious despite her twelve-year-old frame and aging vitals, fought her way to her second successive triumph in the thirty-first running of this motorboat classic on Lake George this afternoon.

She won the first thirty-mile heat by jumping the fleet of six starters at the gun, nosing them down in the first turn and running a front race from then on without undue strain on her creaking timbers and ten-year-old motor. In the second tussle, she locked with Hornet, the Detroit challenger, in a pulse-quickening, iron-melting duel that lasted for ten miles with the Lizard leaping spectacularly in the wake of the flying blue boat.

Hornet's Motor Overheats

Hornet could not stand the pressure. Her sixteen-cylinder engine overheated, lost revolutions, slowed down and the old El Lagarto bounced past her into a lead which she held without difficulty for the remaining two-thirds of the journey.

Thus it was that when the third and last heat of this ninety-mile test of speed and reliability rolled around, all El Lagarto had to do was cover the course to get enough points to win.

She ambled decorously around twelve circuits of the two-and-one-half-mile oval in the wake of the two other survivors, Bill Horn's galloping Delphine IV and Jack Rutherfurd's Imp, both of them former winners of the trophy. In her own good time she pulled up to the judges' stand, where El Lagarto's sportsman-owner, George Reis, and his Wall Street mechanic, Dick Bowers, received the acclaim of the thousands who watched from afloat and ashore.

El Lagarto broke no records in the course of a victory that was a tribute to the racing strategy of Reis and a record of his stubborn refusal to cave in under the weight of a series of disheartening mishaps that marked the last two weeks of his preparation of the old flyer for her championship defense. But she did push Hornet to the fastest lap that any Gold Cup boat has run since California made her short-lived bid for the trophy at Red Bank in 1930.

Hornet Hits 61.898 Speed

On the first lap of the spectacular second heat, which had the social and sport celebrity studded crowd yelling like the bleacher mob at the Yankee Stadium when Babe Ruth drives out a pinch home run, Hornet knocked off the two and one-half miles at a speed of 61.898 miles an hour. With El Lagarto hammering away in her wash and never giving Benny Hill an instant when he could relieve his throttle pressure, Hornet averaged a fraction over sixty-one miles an hour for the first four laps of that heat. Then she began to slow.

On the backstretch of the fifth lap El Legarto caught and passed her to the accompaniment of frenzied cheering from the predominantly Lake George gallery. Hornet slowed down almost to a walk, staggered around for another lap and then tied up to the float. There Hill climbed disconsolately out of the boat and received a consoling "Tough luck, Benny. You did a good job," from Aaron Deroy, Hornet's owner, who had been watching from the lake front.

Gains Leg on Trophy

Hornet's burst of speed gave her a leg on the trophy her owner has placed in competition for the fastest lap made in Gold Cup competition. It hung on the wall of Reis's living room until tonight, but now it is on its way to Detroit.

Later examination, after Hornet had failed again after six laps of the second heat, revealed ignition and carburetion trouble that would not permit the old Imp and later Delphine VI to run at top speed. She was the smoothest running, best handled and fastest boat in the race, but she lacked the stamina this grind requires.

El Legarto's average speed for the ninety miles was far below the record set last year at Detroit by Delphine IV. Affected, of course, by her intentionally slow last heat, in which she ran at 49.65 miles an hour, El Lagarto's average was 54.99. Delphine IV, champion in 1933, runner-up last year and second again today under the courageous handling of the nerveless Bill Horn, who had a rougher ride today than a rodeo bronche buster, averaged 57.84 for the full journey. Imp, coming back under a new owner in an attempt to regain the laurels she won at Red Bank in 1929, was the third and only other finisher. She was unable to run at full throttle because of a penchant for "snaking" that nearly upset her several times and averaged 54.59 miles an hour.

Grouped with Hornet as non-finishers were Ethyl Ruth, the John B. Shibe entry from Philadelpia, and Scotty II, driven by Sammy Dunsford, the New Hampshire Highlander. Ethyl Ruth came out three-quarters of a lap late for the first heat, ran two laps and then folded up on the south turn with a mess of jammed valves. Scotty, obviously no match in speed for the others, was last in the first heat, but was running third in the second when her engine burned out a connecting rod bearing with two laps to go. That ended Scotty's racing for the day, but she may be out tomorrow when most of the Gold Cup boats and Melvin Crookin's high-powered Betty V. race three fifteen-mile heats for the Governor Lehman Trophy.

Reis got one of his characteristic flying starts in the first heat, hitting the line at the gun at wide open throttle, getting into the turn first and emerging on the backstretch with a good lead over Horn's fearful galloping gadget. Hornet quickly walked by Delphine IV, which is not as fast as she used to be, but every bit as awe-inspiring and breath-taking boat to watch in her frenzied jumping.

Hill, an old automobile recetrack driver, pushed El Lagarto a while, and then decided it was the better strategy to run in second place for the first heat and save something for the second. So the first heat was nothing but a procession, with El Lagarto leaping through the sparkling, sunlit water far out ahead of Hornet, Delphine, Imp and Scotty, in that order.

In the second heat Hill was not letting Reis get the jump and he came up to the line allying. Reis was a little early in his timing and had to cut his speed to avoid beating the gun, so he was last of the pack away. Hornet had a big lead coming out of the turn off Dome Island and El Lagarto was second. For two laps El Lagarto hung on without making any appreciable dent in Hornet's lead, then on the third she began to close in despite the crafty manner in which Hill contrived to keep her driving in broken water.

Flagging Hornet Passed

She was closer at the end of the fourth lap, gained on the lower turn and on the backstretch slowly crept up on and passed the flagging Hornet. To all intents and purposes the race ended there. Hornet went out a lap later, Delphine moved into second place and the stage was set for the formality of running the third heat.

For the most part the Gold Cup boats had water conditions pretty much to their liking and the failure of their speeds to match last year's performances at Detroit is attributable more to the lack of pressure on El Lagarto than to rough going.

But what was nice for the big boats was anything but comfortable for the little outboards that filled the gaps between Gold Cup heats with a deal of interesting racing in Classes A and C. Until late in the afternoon, when the westerly breeze died, the outboard drivers took a fearful pounding. Two of them, Miss Maryland Codd, of Towson, Md., and Jack Ross, of Rouses Point, N. Y., were spilled, and others were put out of commission by accidents to equipment due to the rough going.

Clinton Ferguson, Waban, Mass., schoolboy, shaded Gar Wood jr. in a close contest for Class A amateur honors that carried them far out in front of their competition and made Ferguson's winning time far better than that turned in by the professionals in the same class. Lew Franco of New York, in the throes of a comeback after a disastrous 1933 season, ironed out a hot field in the amateur section of Class C, and Fred Jacoby Jr., continued his string of successes by beating down a small professional turnout.

on a large grandstand will be erected, and other accommodation provided for sightseers and motor-car parking. It is possible that other grandstands will also be erected in the vicinity; but that already referred to, the erection of which will be begun in about a week, will be capable of seating 6,000 people, and there will be standing-room for many thousands more, while parking room will be available for about 2,000 cars.

As showing the demand for accommodation, booking of seats in this stand has been proceeding briskly for the past fortnight, and the promoters have received many orders for block bookings of 100 and 200 seats, despite the fact that prices for stand seats are 15s. and 10s. 6d., with 2s. 6d. for standing-room. Several of these block bookings have come from cities in England, a notable instance being one for a party 300 strong, representative of Hull Technical College, who are chartering a special train to bring them to the Clyde. A shipping and travel firm, also, has taken a block of 700 tickets. Special trains and motor buses from all parts will be run in connection with the launch.

Mathematics Easy To Thinking Robot

Invention Of Lawyer Solves Problems In Trigonometry, Algebra And Arithmetic

A new "mathematical robot," called the "trianalyst," a veritable "thinking machine," which solves complicated problems in algebra, trigonometry and arithmetic much more quickly and easily than any trained mathematician, was announced here yesterday by its inventor, Barrett R. Wellington, a practicing attorney of Troy, N.Y. Mr. Wellington long has been interested in mathematical research as an amateur, especially in the field of Euclidian geometry, says the New York Times.

The new "mechanical brain" is a flat framework of the general shape of a right triangle, containing an inscribed square. The practical model, made of bakelite, occupies a space less than half a square foot and weighs about ten ounces.

As far as the records of the United States Patent Office indicate, Mr. Wellington said, the trianalyst "is the first instrument of its kind to receive a patent from the United States Government." The patents were granted on July 3 last.

Operation Called Easy

The contrivance is an uncomplicated mechanical apparatus, based on geometrical principles. It performs "quickly and easily," Mr. Wellington said, "mathematical operations of various kinds, giving graphical approximations of results to useful degrees of accuracy."

The instrument, according to Mr. Wellington, "affords simple, direct means of solving numerical algebraic equations. It will give, usually with little or no incidental computation, the roots of quadratics, cubics and biquadratics, as well as the roots of certain restricted forms of still higher equations and various classes of simultaneous equations."

"In addition to this," the inventor declares, "one, two or three settings of the parts present the solution of any one of numerous complicated formulae involving multiplication, division, addition, subtraction and powers and roots of numbers expressed in one moment of combination.

"Some of these comprise each as many as twenty arithmetical operations. Many of them are habitually used in the various branches of applied mechanics.

Logarithms Are Given

"A guide curve enables the operator to read immediately the logarithm of any given number at which the indicator is set. By reason of the triangular formulation of the invention, it functions also in the trigonometric field. Through the medium of a detachable protractor, there may be solved, by rapid approximation the basic problems of trigonometry.

The invention, Mr. Wellington revealed, came about by a coincidence. In making analyses of the right triangle from original points of attack, he was led to inscribe a square in the triangle, and on so doing "came upon a group of five remarkable propositions."

"These propositions," he said, "have hitherto passed unnoticed, or, if previously discovered, have attracted no attention. All five are susceptible of rigorous proof, and all enter more or less into the workings of the trianalyst.

Five Propositions Proved

The propositions, he said, are as follows:

"The area of the square inscribed in a right triangle equals the product of the legs each diminished by the edge of the square.

"The edge of the square inscribed in a right triangle equals the product of the legs divided by their sum.

"The side of a right triangle, diminished by the edge of the inscribed square, equals the square of the side divided by the sum of the side and the base.

"The square of the hypotenuse of a right triangle equals the product of the sum of the legs and the sum of the legs each diminished by the edge of the square.

"In a right triangle containing an inscribed square, a smaller similar triangle may be constructed whose hypotenuse will be the sum of the sides, each diminished by the edge of the square; and whose sides will be the hypotenuses of the two inscribed triangles."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Illiterate Postmaster

Mir is a little town, population 3700, in the country of Nieswiez, province of Nowogrod, and has been part of Poland since 1918. Before that it was part of Russia. Under the latter regime the Russian authorities employed a postmaster-letter carrier who could neither read nor write. He would inquire from the first addressee the name of the next one, and repeating this practice was able to make the proper deliveries for many years.

The Elastic Railroad

The longest railroad in the Western Hemisphere is the Canadian National Railways running from Sydney, Nova Scotia, to Prince Rupert, near the Canada-Alaska border—a distance of 5,284 miles.

Each mile of track (single rail) contains 160 rails and due to the expansion of steel in hot weather each rail is ¼ of an inch longer during the summer months—the total difference being approximately 17,000 feet or more than 3 miles.

Moscow Considered One Of Most Amusing Cities

for a number of years can look back on a varied and entertaining parade of foreign pilgrims to the Soviet capital. There was the American woman tourist, who, on emerging from the Lenin Mausoleum, was overheard inquiring: "Who was the gentleman we just saw in there?" There was the married couple from the State of Missouri who, after hearing an edifying lecture on Soviet achievements in the protection of public health, asked in rasping nasal voices: "But what is the Health Commissariat going to do about the flies in the Grand Hotel?" There was the eccentric gentleman who was anxious to set up a statue of Lincoln in every foreign capital, but found the Moscow Soviet coldly indifferent to his proposal. There was the enraptured lady who announced, after a brief sojourn in Moscow, that she could see "triumph written in the skies."

There was the genial Rotarian from California who turned up in Moscow brimming over with three major ideas: to persuade the Soviet Union to join the Rotary International, to donate the interest on one thousand dollars as a prize for the best schoolboy essay on Rotarianism as a force for world peace, and to induce Soviet sport organisations to participate in the Olympic Games. He was apparetnly quite unaware of the fact that the Olympic Games had been denounced in Moscow as a subtle means for training the cohorts of the bourgeoisie for a future interventionist onslaught on the Soviet Union, while the Rotary International would certainly be regarded by Communists as a "class hostile organisation."

A Woman's Poem

There was the ecstatic woman devotee from London who was so overwhelmed by what was shown to her in Russia that she committed her emotions to paper on leaving the country and produced a poem of which the following lines are perhaps sufficiently representative:—

I longed to see your wondrous land,
I yearned to shake you by the hand,
And now at last my dream's come true,
And I have seen and talked with you,
I turn my face unto the West,
Feeling the East is doubly blest.
Comrades, the brightness of your light
Is needed to dispel our night.

The unconscious humour of this outburst was enhanced because the "Moscow Daily News," the English language newspaper of the Soviet Capital, unsatisfied with its adulatory tones, was unwilling to print it without a grave footnote of admonitory correction. China, India, and other "Eastern colonial and semi-colonial countries," it informed the author, are certainly not "doubly blest." It also took exception to a line in the poem which referred to "perfect love casting out fear."

It is perhaps appropriate that in a country which has destroyed the private capitalist system, currency should be one of the chief sources of comedy.

This situation had led to a constant, secret but none the less intense, struggles between foreigners, who are eager to pay for everything in Soviet currency, and the Soviet commercial organizations, which prefer to be paid in anything else. The struggle is all the more amusing, because neither side wishes to come out in the open.

At the present moment cheap roubles have their uses in hiring chauffeurs, purchasing benzine, sending telegrams and buying railroad tickets (although the Soviet authorities do everything in their power to make it difficult and inconvenient to buy a ticket to a destination outside of Russia in roubles) and for some lucky persons, in paying rent. On the other hand rooms in good hotels, new apartments, the better grades of food and manufactured goods and inclusive tourist tickets are purchasable only in foreign currency.

Rome Support Shifted To France

Vienna Turmoil Viewed As Forcing Il Duce To Deny Nazi Policies

When the final accounting has been made of the chaotic events following the assassination of Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss of Austria it may be found that the 40,000 Italian soldiers rushed to the frontier actually had more to do with the question of peace or war in Europe than the few paragraphs the Fascist press gave to this movement of troops would indicate. For more than eighteen months one of the salient features of the Continental alignment has been the support given by Premier Benito Mussolini and Fascist Italy to Chancellor Adolf Hitler and Nazi Germany in the face of many enemies, states an article from Rome to the New York Herald Tribune.

To all appearances this support has dissolved in smoke—or, more accurately, has been dissolved in the cry, "Assassins and Perverts!" Those words are harsh even in the realm of political polemics. It is difficult not to construe them as a renunciation of German friendship, both in defense of Fascist kinship and in that of international policy.

Blow to Mussolini

The assassination of Dr. Dollfuss was a severe blow to Mussolini for personal as well as for political reasons. Il Duce's terms of condolences, condemning those responsible, "both near and far away," the rushing of troops to the border and the outburst of a strictly censored press left no doubt he felt the ultimate responsibility rested on Germany. The fact that only a few weeks earlier Mussolini and Hitler had met on amicable terms at Venice adds to the dramatic element of the situation.

Although every one knew no specific undertaking regarding Austria had been made in Venice, it had been supposed, at least in Italy, that it logically would lead to a lessening of Nazi pressure on the government of Chancellor Dollfuss. However, those who attribute the new antagonism to Germany solely to the assassination of Dr. Dollfuss probably stop short of the whole truth. The shock given to the world by the purge of the Nazi party was at least partly to blame.

Widened Hitler-Duce Rift

The terms in which Mussolini and Hitler discussed Austria at Venice were ambiguous. On another point, however, they were in specific agreement. It confirmed the mutual opposition to such a system of regional pacts as France had been trying to create. With the horrified exclamations of every civilized nation ringing in his ears over the Nazi purge, Mussolini did not hesitate to abandon opposition to the French plan, leaving Germany alone to escape from the dilemma. Hence it is possible to assume that the assassination of Dr. Dollfuss only made more obvious the parting of the ways which already had taken place.

However, even now there are reasons to believe that the parting should be divided into two categories. Considered as a regime "in the new order of things," which Fascism has been preaching, the breach may be complete. Only with difficulty could any recompense be imagined sufficient to wipe out the hard words of the last few days levelled against Hitler and his lieutenants. Fascism apparently has thoroughly renounced National Socialism. When, however, the breach is considered solely in the light of international policy, the problem for Italy is more complicated. The enmity toward Germany over Austria has aligned this country with France. As long as Austria is at stake that alignment may be considered permanent.

Italy's Position Uncomfortable

As matter of general policy it is a far less comfortable position for Italy, naval rivalry will be before the world. It is only one of many matters about which Italy and France still have since the question of Franco-Italian conflicting views.

Baldwin Speech Reflects British Air-Raid Fears

Varying Interpretations Of 'Frontier' Statement Point To Reich 'Menace'

Stanley Baldwin, Acting Premier, terminated a rather pedestrian speech in the House of Commons on the subject of increasing the British Air Force with three sentences which perhaps are the most important spoken by any British statesman during the last decade, says a recent article to the New York Herald Tribune from London. They were: "When you think about the defense of England you no longer think of the chalk cliffs of Dover. You think of the Rhine. That is where today our frontier lies."

Within an hour, Winston Churchill, with the historian's sure instinct for the significant, declared he was sure that Baldwin's words had already gone around the world. They had—and they are still doing so. But they are still also reverberating in England, where attempts are being made to interpret them in a half-dozen different ways.

Diplomatic officials, for instance, have been busily trying to minimize their seriousness; Baldwin, they say, was merely restating what has been a truism ever since this country assumed commitments under the Locarno treaty. Labor and Liberal politicians and newspapers, on the other hand, assert that Baldwin was plainly and bluntly proclaiming Germany as again Britain's potential enemy. Between these extremes there are numerous other "explanations." Meanwhile the man who could settle the question in two minutes—Bladwin himself—remains completely silent.

This fact perhaps furnishes the clew to the real explanation which nobody yet has suggested: that Baldwin's words were neither indiscreet nor merely an attempt to put an old thought into picturesque new words; but that they were deliberately chosen to produce precisely the effect they did—that of uncertainty.

Popular Concept Misleading

Cartoonists and paragraphers have produced for the British people's imagination the concept of Baldwin as an unimaginative, well meaning but rather stupid figure. Nothing could be more misleading. Doubtless it is a valuable asset to Baldwin to be thus underrated; the fact remains he is an extremely able politician who can see further through a brick wall than most people. By phrasing his statement as he did he elated the French and threw a scare into the Germans—but still did not commit himself. Naturally this technique—notably as practiced by Sir Edward Grey in the immediate pre-war years—has its dangers. But at the present time, when a precise definition one way or another might be even more dangerous, it also has its uses.

Gradually, however, the opinion is tending here toward at least an unofficial agreement that Baldwin really meant pretty much what his phrases superficially seemed to indicate: that this government visualizes Germany as a potential aerial menace. Since France and Belgium admittedly do likewise, and since they lie partially between Britain and Germany, it seems to follow logically that the British forces' first efforts to intercept raiding German planes would be along the frontiers of these two countries.

Holland Jealous of Neutrality

Less credence is given here to the reports that the British have been seeking an air base in Holland. Naturally the air force leaders, being good strategists, probably would like to secure this added advantage. But Holland is jealous of her neutrality; neutral Holland is just as useful for British defense as allied Holland, and nothing is more certain anyhow than that if German planes should actually fly over Dutch territory one day on the way to Britain, British planes would take the same route the next day en route to Germany.

Meanwhile the indication that the British government is taking the possibility of air raids seriously is furnished by the fact that measures are being speeded up for the safety of the civil population in the event of war. Local authorities and public utility companies are being brought into consultation by the War Office; chemists are preparing instructions for gasproofing dwellings and offices; inquiries as to the manufacture of gasmasks by the million are being made.

And all this, appropriately enough, coincides neatly with the twentieth anniversary of the outbreak of the war which was to end wars.

Panama Canal Near 20th Year Of Trade Gains

Opened To Ships Aug. 15, '14, It Is Now Recovering Outlay Lost During Slump

Opened to the world's shipping traffic twenty years ago, the Panama Canal has grown constantly in its importance in national and international affairs of the United States, says the New York Herald Tribune in its issue of August 11. Built at a cost of $539,000,000,—figures computed by the government bureau of efficiency—the canal suffered at first from landslides and the chaotic commercial situation prevailing during the World War. A period of prosperity followed and then the canal was struck by the world-wide depression.

Last year, however, world trade began to revive, bringing increased business to the "big ditch" and coincidentally the canal's strategic importance was dramatically impressed on the world in May when the entire United States' fleet crossed from the Pacific to the Atlantic in one unit and within forty-eight hours.

Further attention to the canal's importance in relations between the United States, its insular territories and possessions and the international policies of the republic was occasioned last month when President Roosevelt passed through aboard the U. S. S. Houston en route to Hawaii.

Building Required Ten Years

Building of the canal by the United States required about ten years. While American money and brains are generally credited with its construction, European labor furnished most of the brawn, and the efficiency of the "Gallegos," Spaniards from the region of Galicia, is still remembered.

In 1906, when work on the dredging was intensified, about 1,200 Spaniards were employed. Their services were so satisfactory that in 1907 and 1908 about 7,000 more were brought to the Isthmus. They were a hardy, vigorous group, trained to severe and continuous labor, and accustomed to meager wages and frugal living.

Most of the contract labor, however, was obtained from the nearby West Indies, which furnished 30,000 laborers. About 2,000 Italians, 1,500 Colombians, 1,100 Greeks and smaller number of Frenchmen and Armenians.

While the canal was opened August 15, 1914, it subsequently had to be closed on account of landslides, which delayed its usefulness and greatly increased the cost over advance estimates. On July 20, 1920, it was reopened and during the last fourteen years has exerted a tremendous influence on maritime affairs.

Most regions profited, but some, especially Southern Chile, which formerly profited by trade around Cape Horn, were adversely affected.

Commercial traffic rose until the peak in 1929, then the depression hit the world. Shipping everywhere was reduced and for the first time in many years, some steamers found it cheaper to make the long journey around the Horn, then to pay the tolls through the canal. The low ebb was reached in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933, when only 3,393 ships made the transit, paying tolls of $19,620,459, compared with 4,506 the year before, paying $20,707,856.

Revival began in August 1933, and in the year ended June 30, 1934, the canal showed an increase for the first time, 5,533 ships and tolls of $24,063,789. Principal gains were registered in trade between continents outside North America, offset by other losses.

Commerce Shows Improvement

Commerce between Europe and the west coast of South America improved recently, as did that between the Atlantic Coast of the United States and the Pacific Coast of South America, and between Europe and Australia. Trade between the Pacific Coast of the United States and Europe declined, due to curtailed oil and grain shipments, usually second largest in the trade of the canal.

Operated under the War Department, the present Governor of the Canal Zone is Lieutenant Colonel Julian L. Schley.

Faultless Driving

Bill Sims of Canton, Ohio, started driving trucks, taxis, and private automobiles way back in 1911 and his total mileage, since that time is more than a million—more than forty times around the world. And in these 23 years Sims has never been involved in an accident of any kind—a very praiseworthy record.

Yet Mr. Sims' three driving rules are simple enough. Keep your car under control at all times; slow up at crossing or where visibility is impaired; and always do the right thing when you believe the other driver is going to do the wrong thing. Observance of these rules by all motorists would surely reduce the ever-amounting list of auto accidents in the United States every year.

Rev. James Hind, Missionary Dies

Spent 45 Years In Field And Converted Hundreds; Death Occurred At Karuizawa

The Rev. James Hind of the Church Missionary Society died at Karuizawa on August 31, after a serious illness and operation.

He spent 45 years of his life in the missionary field and his home for the greater part of his life in Japan was at Kokura in northern Kyushu, but during the last nine years he had lived at the neighboring city of Tobata.

The visible memorial of his labors is a line of Japanese churches at Moji, Kokura, Yawata, Tobata and Wakamatsu and also at Nogata in the coal-mining district to the south. During the Russo-Japanese War he and his wife were given absolute freedom to visit and teach in the three great military hospitals at Kokura where over six hundred men were converted.

The late Mr. Hind was born in 1861 at Harrow and was educated at Framlingham, Suffolk, and at Queen's College, Cambridge. After practising for a short time as a solicitor, he was called to the Ministry and was ordained to a curacy at All Souls Church, Langham Place, London. Two years later he sailed for Japan.

The funeral service was held at Christ Church, Karuizawa, on Sunday at 2 p.m. There was a large congregation for the deceased was loved and respected, not only as a keen missionary but as a Karuizawa summer resident of some thirty years' standing.

He was the author of "Walks and Excursions" issued by the K.S.R.A. The Rev. K. Sansbury, summer chaplain, conducted the service, assisted by Canon A. C. Hutchinson and the Rev. J C. Mann. The Revs. F. N. Scott, E. G. Hutchinson, S. C. Woodward, F. H. B. Wood, and Messrs. E. V. Gatenby and A. S. Hornby acted as pall-bearers. The opening hymn was "Alleluia; the strife is o'er" and the closing hymn, "For all the saints".

The interment was held at Karuizawa Foreign Cemetery and it was in accordance with his own often expressed desire that he was laid to rest there. He is survived by his widow.

British Merchant Marine Needs Replacement, Says Sir Archibald

There is some justification for the widespread impression that the British Merchant Navy consists, in large degree, of old and inefficient ships, says Sir Archibald Hurd in an article recently for the Observer. He said:

Why should the Government offer to lend money at a low rate of interest to owners who scrap old vessels and replace them by new ones in the proportion of three tons to one if there are not too many old vessels under the British flag? That is a fair question. The principal reason for the Government's action is that nearly half the shipyard craftsmen in this country are still without work with the prospect of another "black winter" before them. Under normal conditions many contracts would be placed in the next few months for the freight markets, owing to the wheat boom, are improving. But some owners have apparently lost courage owing to the character of the competition at sea, and others have exhausted their financial resources. The scrap and build scheme is an attempt, first, to give a fillip to the shipbuilding industry, and, secondly, to raise the general level of efficiency of British shipping.

Struggles Against Near Odds

Though British shipowners have been fighting against heavy odds for the past five years, they have not neglected to maintain their fleets. They have had difficulty in doing so, because under the control exercised by the Ministry of Shipping during the Great War they were not

Clash Strains Turko-Italian Relations Anew

Shooting Of Sailor By Kemal's Sentries Results In Intensified Nervousness

The shooting of an Italian sailor by Turkish sentries on the Aegean coast, near Anatolia, following, as it does, the Anglo-Turkish incident over the shooting of British naval officers, has emphasized the unfavorable state of Turko-Italian relation, says an Istanbul dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune on August 11.

After having been good for several years, Turko-Italian relations become strained when Premier Benito Mussolini made a speech last spring in which he referred to the necessity of "Italian 'co-operation or expansion' in Asia." The speech excited great comment in Tukey, and the Turkish Ambassador in Rome, Vassif Bey, was told by his government to seek explanations from Il Duce personally. The latter replied that he did not regard Turkey as being part of Asia. Such an explanation could hardly satisfy the Turks, considering that the greater part or the territory of the young republic is in Asia.

Kemal Makes Inspection Tour

To show that he was not satisfied, Ghazi Mustapha Kemal accompanied by his military advisers, left Angora on a visit of inspection to Smyrna, Balikessir and Chanak, all of which are strategic points in western Turkey and all of which would be important if an invasion of Anatolia ever took place. The Ghazi visited the coastal defenses at Smyrna and made it clear that his voyage was a reply to Mussolini's utterances.

Directly the Ghazi returned to Angora the Cabinet was summoned, and it was announced that considerable increases were to be made in the Turkish Army, Navy and air force. These increases were to be made in both the personnel and material of the fighting forces. Parliament at once voted a large supplementary credit of many millions.

About twenty new taxes were imposed, the proceeds of which, it was officially stated ,would go solely to the Ministry of National Defense, which comprises the Army, Navy and Air forces. Since then the government has pressed forward its program of strengthening the fighting forces.

Many Turks Fear Trouble

Now, although it is very difficult for any thinking persons to believe that Fascist Italy should go to war with Kemalist Turkey, it is unfortunately the case that many Turks fear that such an eventuality is not to be ruled out. In consequence, it is highly probable that Turkey will go on arming while she will certainly fortify the Straits—the Dardanelles—whether or not permission is granted.

One reason so few impartial observers believe that there is little chance of Italy attacking Turkey is that the memory of the Greek army's disaster at Smyrna in 1922 must surely be fresh in the minds of the Italians. If any invading force succeeded in landing in Asia Minor, the Turks would presumably retreat into the interior and make the contest a prolonged one. It would be very difficult and costly for Italy, or any other power, to maintain a large army on Turkish territory indefinitely.

New Fortification Held Menace

Turkey is, however, determined to leave nothing to chance, especially as the reported fortification by Italy of certain islands in the Dodecanese—only a few miles from the Turkish mainland—is not understood in Turkey and is regarded as a veiled menace. Furthermore, the possibility of an Italian-Bulgarian military understanding has made the Turks concentrate on the repopulation of eastern Trace, plus the fortification of the Adrianople area.

As regards the two recent incidents along Turkey's Aegean seaboard, it is undeniable that the fear which the Turks have of Italy has been an important factor. In both cases, Turkish sentries say—and there is no reason to doubt their veracity—that they only carried out orders. These orders consist, first of all, in warning any strange craft, within the three-mile limit, to stop. If this order is not at once obeyed the sentries have orders to fire into the air; if no notice is taken of this signal, the sentries have definite instructions to fire on the occupants of the craft, whoever they may be.

The three British officers were in a sailing boat and did not understand the Turkish orders; one of the officers was killed, another wounded, while the third escaped. The incident was satisfactorily settled, through the usual diplomatic channels, but it nevertheless created a stir. Then, only ten days later, an Italian fishing boat was fired at—so the Italian say—and one fisherman killed. The Italians admit that their boat was within the three-mile limit, but explain that it had been carried there by a storm. So far, this incident has not been settled and it is possible that the Italians may take a stronger attitude than that adopted by the British.

One thing which these two incidents have proved is the extreme nervousness which prevails along the Aegean coast. The Turks would appear to be afraid that the Italians and other foreigners are trying to spy out their coastal defenses. If any further incidents of this nature occur, the tension between Turkey and other countries may become serious.

Traffic Snarl Baffles S.A. City

Proposed Transport Monopoly Results In Threat Of Big Strike

The Buenos Aires traffic problem forms one mixup after another. Efforts to solve the daily jams produce tangles with the transit companies, states a despatch from that city dated August 4. A proposed transport monopoly tightened the knot even more when omnibus workers threatened to strike—with other transport workers and longshoremen out in sympathy—thus leading to a general tie-up.

The city traffic has defeated a score of experts and commissions. Nothing less than a complete rebuilding of the center would solve it according to a commission in 1931. Four avenues have been broadened since then and two diagonal arteries cut at a cost of 50,000,000 pesos. Traffic tangles are still the rule.

Built for horse-drawn traffic, the city has had to slice its sidewalks until single-file walking is necessary. Couples arm-in-arm constitute a public inuisance. It is a crime, punishable by prison, to stick your arm out of the street car window—some pedestrian might get knocked out. Broadening is costly and limited to certain sections.

The problem involves construction as well as co-ordination. The municipality's 125,000,000 peso arterial scheme attacks the first. The monopoly bill, producing the present controversy, attacks the second—with government approval.

General Traffic Strike Threatens

The general traffic strike is threatened if the bill gains a congressional majority. Bitterly contested by Socialists and National Democrats—congressional opinion seems every divided—the measure would give over passenger traffic to a "transport corporation" for sixty years.

Underground railways have been suggested as the solution, and eighteen miles are in operation, but it is contended that unless overground traffic is rationalized, construction of underground is economically unsound. The two subway lines show increasing daily losses—amounting to five million pesos the last six months. It was to co-ordinate traffic and open the way to profitable investment in subways that the transport bill was drafted.

The measure provides that all traffic, including 480 miles of tramlines, 6,000 omnibuses and "micro-buses" and the eighteen miles of subway, would be co-ordinated by a public charter corporation on the basis of the five tramway and underground companies now operating. The charter would extend for sixty years and give the board exclusive constructional rights and almost dictatorial powers to suppress overlapping and uneconomic service.

It is against this latter clause that the bus workers are fighting. Most of the micro-buses, which are miniature twelve-seater buses, are owned and operated either by private individuals or small companies. The omnibus companies are comparatively small.

Underground and tram companies insisted the competition of the motor traffic, concentrated on the heavy lines, and leaving the suburban lines unserved, was the cause both of the tangle and the losses of the companies which are bound to serve unprofitable as well as profitable lines. The bus services fearing the ax refused to accept the monopoly bill under any circumstances.

To break the deadlock, the government moved to create a special charter under which voting in the corporation would not be governed by amount of shares, but divided representation of contending services, equally between fixed installation and without fixed installation. In dispute, the final vote would be in the hands of a government representative.

Educators Dine, T-Bone Steaks And Dignity Go

600 Frolicking Professors Of Teachers College Put Decorum Aside At Outing

T-bone steaks, the class struggle, and an appalling absence of beer shared the attention of 600 educators recently at the annual Teachers College steak dinner (for men only) on the wooded bluff above the campus of the Horace Mann School for Boys, Riverdale, the Bronx, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The steak dinner, which has become a tradition at Columbia University Teachers College in the last twenty years, was designed to dispel for an afternoon the academic air generally associated with educators. In the words of the founder, Dr. George D. Strayer, of the department of educational administration at Teachers College, "We just thought it would be a nice thing for the boys to have an afternoon of play."

And So the Boys Play

All afternoon, therefore, the boys played, diligently. They played at baseball, at tennis, at croquet, ping pong and quoits. Spectators smiled approvingly when a district superintendent of public schools, quite beside himself in a tense moment of the ball game, barked encouragement to the pitcher with: "Wrap it around his neck, big boy!" No one frowned a moment later when a staid high school principal, victim of an umpire's faulty vision, cried in extreme disgust, "Aw, go sit down!"

"A spirit of comradeship and good fun prevails," explained Dr. Strayer, who had written "George" on his sailor cap.

Presently some one atop the bluff announced that dinner was ready, a summons that soon emptied the campus below. Forgetting their dignity, the educators jostled for positions in line and marched double time up the steep path to a small meadow where the steaks had been prepared on charcoal grills. Each professor received a sixteen-ounce steak, garnished with red tomatoes, dill pickles, potato salad and raw onions.

All cutlery equipment was barred, so the professor squatted on the rocks, grasped the steak, firmly in both hands and buried their faces in them. Regulations forbidding the use of knives, forks and spoons were defended by Dr. Strayer.

Beer Ban Brings Grumblings

"I suppose some people would object to this," he said, "but I don't think it hurts a bit. And it's so much better than going to a restaurant."

Beer also was barred, but not without mutterings from some of the professors.

"This gang doesn't go in for that stuff," maintained Dr. Strayer.

Inside of four minutes and fifteen seconds every one had been served. When the last steak had been devoured, the educators gathered in a circle, sang "Home on the Range," and heard discussions on their position in the class struggle.

According to Dr. Goodwin B. Watson, associate professor of education at Teachers College, the nation is in the preliminary stages of a revolution in which educational administrators must definitely align themselves with "the under privileged."

Dr. Watson found the nation's educators inflective in the present crisis because of their attempts to assume a middle-of-the-road stand between the "privileged" and the "under-privileged."

"The educational administrator must stand like a man with one foot on each side of an ever-widening precipice," he said. Unfortunately most of the weight seems to be on the piece that is about to break off.

"All of us feel something of the same conflict. We have been rather in favor of the old court, and yet we are spiritually dedicated to the slogans on the banners of the rebels."

Finds Rebels Have More Vitality

Dr. Watson suggested that the "rebels" seemed to have more "biological vitality."

"If we move with the current we may be able to steer—if we try to move against it not only is our rudder powerless but our craft will be broken," he said.

He urged the teachers to bring about organized co-operative action to see that "every individual child in your schools has enough to eat, decent clothes to wear, a chance for schooling . . . and a guaranteed job." He advised the creation of a committee which would try to sketch "some of the main features of the new America we want to build."

Free discussion of such controversial subjects as public ownership of utilities should be permitted in the schools, insisted Dr. William Hugo Lamb superintendent of schools in Star River, Mo.

"During the impending struggle when labor seeks to secure its just share of the nation's income. I don't see how the school can be content to center its emphasis upon the glorious traditions which we inherited from the founders of the Republic," he said.

"We have no reason to suppose, however, that the private "Insullian utility" will permit open discussion on comparative power rates without a protest. Neither will they be content to rest their cases by merely interviewing the local superintendent of schools.

Dictators' Desire

The Erzberg situated near Eisenerz, in the Austrian province of Styria, is about 5,000 feet high and consists solely of iron ore (50 per cent pure iron). It is estimated to contain more than 300,000,000 tons of ore and is the highest iron mountain in the world.

Since Germany has been deprived of her pre-war ore supply the Erzberg figures very largely in Hitler's alleyed plans of annexing Austria. Mussolini's Italy which is also dependent upon foreign ore, has its eye on the Erzberg, and in the event of a war between Yugoslavia and Italy, the Italian plans are said to already foresee a rapid invasion of Styria to get to the Erzberg ahead of the Yugoslavians.

Scientists Attack British Radio And Movie Producers

Missionaries Also Roughly Handled At University College Meeting

The B.B.C., film producers, and missionaries were all roughly handled at one session of the International Congress of Anthropological and Ethnographical Sciences at University College, London, recently.

The first two were attacked by Professor T. H. Pear, the Manchester psychologist, and the third by Dr. L. S. B. Leakey, who recently made the discovery that men of apparently modern type lived in East Africa the greater part of a million years ago.

Professor Pear complained that neither wireless nor film producers were sufficiently anxious to find out what the public really thought of their products.

The B.B.C.'s post-bag, he said, was unlikely to give statistically satisfactory information. Box-office receipts at cinemas were an equally unsatisfactory criterion, while the American habit of sending observers to report on an audience's vocal reception of a film could only be applied to some types of film, and at the best only gave information as to the noisiest section of the audience.

The one industry, Professor Pear suggested, was afraid that too much knowledge of this kind would result in the tone of its productions being lowered, while the other had exactly the opposite fear. Was it the B.B.C., the scientists wondered, which was in need of more uplift?

Stereoscopic Films

Then Professor Pear passed to other criticisms. Film producers, he said, wanted a new name for so-called educational films which would not put people off; and in the present move towards color and stereoscopy they were allowing science to pull against art.

"Absence of color," he said, "allows the photographer to do extraordinary things with light and shade, and a stereoscopic film is at present a very dull thing." The framing of a film picture in the screen was effective artistically and the effect would not be improved by too much realism.

Then a tilt at the educated film-goer. Why was it that people whose taste in music, literature, food and dress was delicately discriminative, would tolerate any crudity, cruelty or banality in the cinema? The answer, "It's only the flicks," merely added to the psychological puzzle.

The Missionaries

Dr. Leakey bluntly blamed missionaries for what he considers their share in the breakdown of the traditional polygamy of East African tribes, with the attendant evils of immorality and prostitution.

"Christian missionaries," he said, "have introduced a new conception of marriage and a new code of morals which they firmly believe to be better than those of the native Africans, but which were often not suitable for the African still living under his own tribal conditions.

"Often," he emphasized, "the effect of the missionaries' efforts to change things rapidly has been the complete breakdown of the old customs and the newly-introduced code as well."

He challenged the missionaries present to produce any single condemnation of polygamy in the New Testament. They should distinguish, he said, between the basic principles of Christianity and the social customs of Europe.

Where there were communities with many more women than men and no other outlet was provided for women than marriage, it was only fair, he said, and indeed economically necessary, that polygamy should be allowed.

Summing up, the Chairman, the Rev. Edwin Smith, who has had eighteen years' missionary experience, said that he personally would not refuse to admit a man to the Church because he was polygamous. But he would not allow a young man already admitted to the Church to marry more than one wife. The Church must hold up a high ideal, but must be patient.

The discussion had been deliberately arranged in order to allow anthropologists, administrators, and missionaries to discuss this important common problem.

Capacity to Learn

African natives were also discussed by Professor Spearman, the London psychologist, who stated that he was engaged on working out tests of knowledge-acquiring ability, which he hoped would be equally applicable to all races.

Professor Spearman expressed the belief that it might prove possible to tabulate individual personalities in terms of a limited number of definite factors. A string of numbers would then represent, to within a fair degree of accuracy, the character of each one of us.

Psychology's third contribution to the day's proceedings was the revelation by Dr. R. D. Gillespie, of Guy's Hospital, that probably nearly half the population of Britain were suffering from psychological difficulties of some kind. This conclusion was based on the examination of 700 school children at his hospital.

More than three-quarters of these difficulties, he said, were treatable. Yet they were responsible for between a tenth and a third of all ascertained illness, and the human wastage was even greater because such illness were generally of a protracted type.

The great need, he said, was for the perfection of rapid methods of treatment.

In the formidably named section of "Anatomy and Physical Anthropology" Mr. Stephen Jones, of University College, added a lighter touch to the proceedings. This distinguished scientist has been swallowing small metal chains, and sniffing others up his nose, in order that X-Ray pictures could be taken showing the movements during speech of his tongue and vocal organs.

The procedure, he says, is quite comfortable, while his speech remains so natural that it is impossible for a listener to tell whether the scientist's gullet is, or is not, obstructed by one of the chains.

The method is expected to be useful, not only in analysing the speech production of different races, but in teaching the European to master correctly the difficult sounds of some of the African languages.

Soviet's Word Awaited To End Debt Deadlock

Russian Debt Negotiations Proves Hard Problem For United States

President Roosevelt's approval was linked with the stand of the State Department today as Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, indicated that only direct word from Moscow would save the Russian debt negotiations from a permanent deadlock, says the August 12 issue of the New York Herald Tribune.

From his conference with the President at the White House brought back to the State Department what appeared to be an even stronger determination to insist on swift completion of the debt discussions in a settlement which would be acceptable to this government. It was indicated that in the discussions with Alexander Troyanovsky, Soviet Ambassador, the limit of American concessions on the matter of reduction of America claims and future extension of commercial credits by the United States had been set forth. The Soviet Ambassador was to communicate with Moscow and await an answer which would define the upshot of the prolonged negotiations.

Secretary Hull said in answer to a question on the Russian debt situation that he would not be able to furnish any information—not for a few days yet. He added significantly that the department could give the press something one way or another within a few days.

Asked what had caused "the critical juncture," Mr. Hull said he could not go into details. He said he wanted to get the matter determined one way or another without undue delay. He volunteered no objection to the use of the word "critical" in the question directed to him.

Both the State Department and the President are represented to be extremely anxious to reach an agreement with Russia, but they are not prepared either to make a large longterm loan to the Soviet or to give up substantially the American government claims for repayment of the $187,000,000, loaned to the Kerensky provisional government in Russia. On both these problems differences are reported to have arisen, the Soviet holding out for large credits and attacking the Kerensky loan as having aided revolutionary White Russian elements opposed to the Soviet regime.

American negotiators have indicated to Russia that medium-term credits to a limited amount would be available for the financing of American exports to Russia through the export-import bank created to facilitate trade with the Soviet. Should the debt negotiations fail, this bank will never operate and any large increase in trade with Russia will presumbaly be impossible.

Meanwhile the State Department sought to facilitate its plans to enlarge and stabilize American trade with other countries by calling on supply date for use in the negotiation of reciprocal trade pacts. Officials have informally requested industry to report on administrative practices in other countries which may limit American trade. Reports on other injurious foreign regulations are also requested.

According to the United States Chamber of Commerce, as advised by Federal officials, another type of information possessed by the trade which would be valuable to government officials is the rate of duty on a particular product which would permit a substantial increase in exports of that product to the foreign country concerned.

"American business interests are frequently in a position to gauge the strength of the competition encountered in a foreign country from domestic producers within the country in question," the chamber said. "In resulting from the imposition of tariff rates, rather than the advantages enjoyed by local producers, may be the principal limiting factor in expanding the market for the American product. In either case, American exporters may be in a position to indicate the extent to which a tariff in the foreign country must be reduced in order to permit a substantial expansion of exports to the country concerned.

"So far as competition of imports from other producing countries is concerned, it may not be possible by reason of most-favored-national obligations of the country in question to have a discriminating rate in favor of the United States, but it may be possible to obtain a reduction in existing customs duty that will open up an import market, in which our exporters may compete for increased volume of business.

"Another practical aspect of trade agreements on which those in the business may be able to point out opportunities for increased American export trade is in indicating promising specialties for which a foreign market may be greatly increased."

U.S. Chamber Estimates Only 7 Million Idle

Report Finds Depression Responsible For 5 Million, Deducting Normal Ratio

The United States Chamber of Commerce, challenging the pessimistic figures of the American Federation of Labor, made public the estimate of the business world today that there are fewer than 7,000,000 persons unemployed for all reasons, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

In contrast to the more than 10,000,000 unemployed which the American Federation of Labor estimated in its latest announcement, the Chamber declared that when the 2,000,000 normally unemployed are deducted from careful tabulations, "the estimate of those who in July were out of employment by reason of business conditions cannot exceed 5,000,000."

The Chamber declared that this was a "regrettable figure," but said it did not suggest discouragement. The remedy, it added, was in the continued advance of the activity of private industry where 40,000,000 persons already are occupied.

The defects in unemployment statistics were minimizing the extent of re-employment in manufacturing industries, the report asserted.

Worried by Aluminum Strike

Meanwhile, in connection with the general labor situation, officials surveyed with uneasiness the commencement of the strike in the plants of the Aluminum Company of America, which is dominated by Mellon interests. Begun with the authorization of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, the strike was expected to take on unusual bitterness despite the fact that it may not involve more than 15,000 men. The antagonism to the Mellon interests as representing conservative industrial leadership was expected to give emphasis to the labor trouble.

The new National Labor Relations Board had received no direct complaints from the aluminum workers but it volunteered to use its offices as a mediator and sent investigators to New Kensington, Pa. As a rule, the board has limited its role to that of judicial determination of issues laid before it. The strike was precipitated by the company's rejection of union demands characterized as meaning a closed shop.

One danger seen in the situation was that the strike might spread to steel mills where a special labor board, set up by President Roosevelt, is attempting to adjust labor controversies which were near a crisis seven weeks ago.

Text of Chamber's Statement

The chamber's statement on unemployment follows:

Statistics and figures are altogether different things, but the distinction is being lost in many statements about unemployment. Anything like a realistic examination of the data that are available makes evident current exaggerations.

It becomes apparent that there is even abuse of the term "unemployment." Its definition for any reliable statistical purpose is not easy, but to count as "unemployed" all those not at work on a particular day or in a particular week, including those who would not have jobs even at the peak of a boom, does not promote clear understanding.

Any figures for the number of unemployed persons in so large a country as ours, and with so varied conditions, must be an estimate. There are no real statistics for employment, or unemployment, month by month in a population of 125,000,000. If all the reliable data to be had are gathered, and if there is care to err upward rather than downward—in order that there may be no chance for intelligent criticism of the result as too small—there is reached for July an estimate under 7,000,000 for persons in unemployment for all reasons.

Total Scaled Down to 5,000,000

This is a gross figure. It includes many persons that are unemployable, those who will not work, those whose employment comes normally at other season of the year, and those that have voluntarily left employment for reasons of their own. The gross figure even includes persons who formerly were occupied in field, are not now employed in it, but who are fully employed in a different field for which statistics are not collected.

Obviously, much refining of the gross figures should be in order, before it receives serious consideration for any important purpose. There are no data which permit exactness in the refining process, but existing data point definitely the direction to be taken and the approximate size of minimum reductions. They make clear, too, that when unemployment caused by the depression is under consideration, at least 2,000,000 must must be taken from the bottom of the gross figure. For even in a period of great economic activity, with "full employment" in all quarters, there are in unemployment at any given time several million persons out of a working population of 50,000,000 or more. By such processes, and with care to make allowance for young persons reaching the age when they seek employment, the estimate of those who in July were out of employment by reason of business conditions cannot exceed 5,000,000.

Statistics of Idle Held Unreliable

That is a regrettable figure, but there is in it no suggestion of a task of discouraging proportions, or of a prolonged struggle against unemployment. The remedy is in continued advance in our fields of activity where well over 40,000,000 persons are already occupied.

As the task goes forward, however, actual progress will be obscured by the defects in the gross figures for unemployment. These defects have already minimized the extent of re-employment in manufacturing industries. The gross figure indicates that more than 1,000,000 persons were added to pay rolls of manufacturing establishments during the preceding twelve months. In view of the unprecedented extent to which industries had earlier spread work and maintained the number of persons on pay rolls at a much higher level than their level of production, any such addition to pay rolls is a large accomplishment. In fact, the accomplishment was even larger than the gross figure discloses.

Analysis of the manufacturing part of the gross figure makes evident a lag in the indices upon which it is based, due to an apparently unavoidable preponderance in the indices of old plants which are not advancing in their activities and employment so rapidly as many newer enterprises. As yet there is no way to compute the exact amount by which employment in manufacturing is understated, but that there is understatement there can be little doubt.

If a well-known remark were to be paraphrased, it could be said that what the country needs is not more statistics but better statistics.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Petrified At Will

Stanley Pospisil of Detroit can erect a "petrified" house in which there are no nails, bolts, crews or pegs, no wood or shingles, no plaster, and none of the ordinary building materials, yet the house is of double wall construction and is entirely fire-proof, storm-proof, insect-proof and sanitary.

Mr. Pospisil uses a special building material that "petrifies" when solid, thus making the finished house just as intact and perfect as though it had been naturally petrified in its construction.

Highest Holdover

Morgan G. Bulkeley (1837-1922) ran for Governor of Connecticut in 1888 against a Democratic opponent. None of the candidates received a majority of the popular vote and the election therefore devolved upon the State Legislature which made Bulkeley Governor. At the next election, the people again failed to elect a Governor by popular vote, but this time the two legislative bodies, beingg of a different political faith, could not agree between them. A deadlock resulted and in accordance with the provision of the Constitution, Governor Bulkeley, although neither elected nor appointed, continued to hold office for another full term.

less and fear nothing we can successfully defeat anything that may be attempted.

Surprised at Nazi Weakness

"Personally I frankly admit that I was astonished to see in the recent putsch how" few supported the Nazi. Of course, I was always convinced that the great majority of the people would have nothing to do with them. Their strength lies in the discontent of the young men, the roots of which are much more economic than political.

"Political cranks who are always ready to waste their time on the latest fantastic theories and who are inaccessible to sober argument are another source of their strength. But the majority of our population consists of peasants, tradesmen and workers who have no time to bother with political sensationalism."

Prince Starhemberg then turned to the situation in the provinces.

"Go to the average Austrian village of 500 inhabitants," he said. "You will find there a doctor, a veterinary surgeon, two lawyers and a storekeeper with his two assistants. The rest of the village will consist of peasants and artisans who work from 4 A. M. to 8 P. M. and have no time for politics.

"This enables the doctor, the lawyers and their friends to open their mouths all the wider as they sit with their beer mugs in the inn and shout cries of 'Heil Hitler!' especially as the hour grows late and more and more beer is consumed.

Workers Are "Invisible'

"Any one arriving at the inn would imagine the village was a hotbed of national socialism. That is because the real population, the remaining 490 hard-working people, is invisible. They have certainly no time for Nazi fantasies. It is true that here and there you will find a few ruined farmers who have gone over to the Nazi because the Nazis promise them anything they want.

"I have always known that this was the true position in the countryside, but nevertheless the feebleness of the support accorded the Nazis did surprise me.

"More and more our population is realizing that Austria's mission to preserve her independence is the duty she owes Europe as being the first necessity for the preservation of world peace."

Prince Starhemberg revealed that those killed on the government side in the recent revolt numbered ninety-five. There are still no figures on the Nazi losses but they must have been many times greater on account of the defective armaments of the Nazis.

"The determined attitude of the Italian Government had a great effect in the critical days," the Prince declared. "Italy left nobody in doubt of her determination to defend with vigor the independence of Austria. This we recognize with great gratitude."

The Vice Chancellor concluded by asking the press to reassure foreigners that security for life and limb was assured in Austria. He could not promise that bombs would not go off here and there, but he did promise that in a short time he would clean up the terrorists.

Japan Improves Technical Skill

Remarkable Development In Industry Attributed To Better Equipment

A remarkable development has been made in technical skill and machinery equipment in all branches of Japanese industries. As the Japanese industry started considerably later than other advanced countries, it was able to avail itself of the benefits from the start of new superior machinery and other equipment perfected in the advanced countries. The success of Japanese mills in skilful mixing of different grade of cotton is well known. The cheapest grade is used as much as possible in spinning cotton yarn of desired counts, in consideration of the price of raw cotton of the different countries and the nature and price of cotton yarn to be spun, and thereby to lower the cost of production. The adption of the one process system of mixing and blowing in the process of opening, mixing and batting or blowing, the "simplex" in the process of slubbing, intermediate and roving and the highdraft in the process of spinning has effected considerable economy in the labor required in cotton spinning. It is reported that while the cost of producing one bale of cotton yarn of 20 counts was 25 yen in a mill with 30,000 spindles equipped in the old way, it was 22 yen in the case of the same mill equipped with highdraft spinning frames and 20 yen in that equipped with both highdraft and simplex frames. Considerable improvement has also been made in respect of maintaining the most suitable temperature and moisture in the spinning process.

A remarkable improvement has been made in the weaving department with the introduction of the automatic loom. About 80 percent of the looms in Japanese weaving factories under the management of spinning concerns are estimated to to be automatic. A person usually operating anywhere between 4 and 6 power looms at a time, can manage anywhere between 20 and 30 automatic looms and a skilled worker from 40 to 50.

The Japanese cotton industry is also highly electrified in the direction of lighting plants and generating motive power. According to the Japan Cotton Spinners' Association while only 50 percent of the power consumed in spinning mills in 1922 was electric, this increased to 88 percent in 1929 and 97 percent in 1933.

Considerable improvement has also been made in technical skill in local weaving concerns. Special attention has been given to simplification and standardization of products. As an example of improvement in machinery equipment for better efficiency, the installment of automatic stop equipment in workshops whose scale is so small as does not permit to introduce automatic looms may be mentioned. In this way the number of looms operated by one worker has been increased to 8 or even 12. It is even reported that as a result of these improvements the cost of production in certain local weaving concerns is 20 or 30 sen per roll lower than that in large scale weaving factories.

Almost all Japanese rayon mills use the viscose process, and though their machines for this purpose are now practically all made in Japan after the model of European ones, they are not inferior to those in other advanced countries; on the contrary, as far as they are used in Japan they are rather superior in that they are made with certain modifications according to Japanese needs and it is even reported that appliances made in Japan for the redemption of caustic soda are superior in many respects to all others. Efforts are constantly being made to effect improvement in technical skill, improvement in the use of raw materials, efficient redemption of chemicals, simplification of process, etc.

As most rayon weaving concerns originally engaged in silk weaving, they have the advantage of being able to apply to the new industry the superior skill developed in silk weaving, and superior technical skill in dyeing and other manufacturing processes, developed in the silk industry, has been very adventageous also to the weaving department of this industry. It should be noticed that most weaving machines are now motor driven.

The improvement of technical skill, machinery and equipment has also permitted of greater efficiency in labor in production. It is reported that inspite of the increase in the volume of production in the Japanese cotton industry, there was a decrease in the number of workers employed.

It is also reported that the output per spindle in the Japanese rayon mills is now one and a half time that in European mills. As Japan turned to the rayon industry much later than other rayon countries, equipment in the Japanese rayon mills is generally modern and they have superior technique in economical production.

The effect of the improvement of technical skill and rationalization of factories in the rayon industry is indicated in the following table, giving a comparison of the detailed production costs in 1928 and 1933.

Africa Suffers Effects Of European Civilization

can find leisure. He should remain in constant touch with the divisable to organize the more progressive members of a town or village into cooperative societies for social progress, such as have proved useful in India.

The impulse towards social betterment is not confined to the adult. A group of boys, calling themselves "the suggesters," have set up signposts on all the roads in their neighborhood. Scout troops are popular, and would be more heartily encouraged by the authorities were not the uniform a temptation to usurp police functions. Clubs for the keeping of poultry and other stock, on the lines of the Young Farmers' Clubs of England, will be free from this particular handicap.

The new African, then, is ready to move forward in the social field and to learn his civic duties. Given a wise lead, from Government or a mission or one of his own race, an appreciable minority will step out, disregarding the ultra-conservatives. But the lead is essential, and it is unfair to expect autochthonous leaders to spring up without the sowing of a seed. Where white guidance is withdrawn or refused, the African is likely to be erratic, and certain of the African sects and Churches afford evidence of this. The Cherubim and Seraphim, hot-gospellers from a large coastal town, proceeded recently to excise devils by hammering nails into the heads of the supposed sufferers. Another modern prophet so inspired his followers that they drank his bath-water, and in an African church building a balcony standing above the altar provides a place for the sacrifice of fowls.

These, however, are casual eccentricities. The new African is, under white captaincy, gaining ground and acquiring balance. Gradually he will learn thrift, will generate a healthy public opinion in his own community, and will defend his individual freedom without breaking up the cohesion of his village; but he will do these things slowly, and if he is left to find his own path without help he will go astray.

Nation-wide Drive On Reds Planned

500,000 Elks To Be Enlisted In Campaign To Combat Communism In U.S.

Alarmed at which is believed to be a nation-wide spread of communism through a network of organized activities, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks has started a campaign to counteract the movement, according to Michael F. Shannon of Los Angeles, newly elected Grand Exalted Ruler, says an article in the August 12 issue of the New York Times.

Mr. Shannon arrived here by airplane today for a conference tomorrow with district deputies of surrounding States to promote the national campaign against communism. He said the 500,000 members of the Elks in 1,400 principal cities would be mustered against radicalism.

"Communistic efforts," Mr. Shannon said, "have gone on until the whole United States is covered with a network of organized activities. The time has arrived in America when the issue is between the Stars and Stripes and the Red flag. It is time to cease talking our devotion to the institutions of the United States and to act our love of country. Let the brains of the builders be as active as the brains of the wreckers."

Lehman Hailed on Ives Bill

He took occasion also to congratulate Governor Lehman of New York on behalf of the lodge for signing the Ives bill, which requires every public school teacher to sign an oath of allegiance to the State and nation.

Tomorrow's conference in the Hotel Traymore will be followed by meetings at Asheville, N. C.; Dallas, Omaha, Colorado Springs, Salt Lake City, Portland, Ore.; San Francisco and Los Angeles.

"On every day in the year," said Mr. Shannon, "the American flag flies above the subordinate lodges of the Order of Elks in 1,400 principal cities of the United States. On every meeting night in every lodge our men gather about an altar adorned with the Stars and Stripes upon which rest the Bible. No man can become an Elk unless he professes, and no man can be a true Elk unless he practices the love of country. This love of country with the Elks has taken on the character of a crusade, and in this crusade the entire membership of 500,000 is being thrown against the advance of Red communism on the institutions of home, church and flag.

Links Reds to Anti-War Group

"The Elks applaud the action of Governor Lehman in signing the Ives bill, which compels every teacher in the public schools to sign an oath to support the Constitutions of the State and nation. A protest signed by 700 teachers and circulated by the teachers committee against war is traceable to communism, the chairman of this committee admitted it was affiliated with the League Against War and Fascism, and that those were offshoots of the United States Congress Against War. Literature of the latter organization shows among its leaders five of the most prominent avowed Communists in the United States.

"The Communist effort has gone on until the whole United States is covered with a net work of organized activities.

Il Duce Frowns On Otto's Hopes

Monarchist Restoration In Austria Does Not Have Italian Support

Reports freely circulated during the past fortnight that the Italian Government is now benevolently considering restoration of the Hapsburgs in Austria as a further safeguard to Austrian independence, are described in Italian official circles yesterday to be absolutely without foundation says the Christian Science Monitor.

It is doubtful whether Archduke Otto will come at all to Italy as has been rumored. But if he does he will have no meetings with Premier Mussolini or with any other member of the Italian Government.

Opposed to Restoration

The attitude of Italy on the question of the Monarchist restoration in Austria has not been influenced in the least by recent events in that country and remains today exactly the same as adopted after the fall of Austro-Hungarian Empire, namely, opposition against the return of the Hapsburgs to the Austrian throne. While it is admitted the restoration in Austria might to some extent lessen the danger of "Anschluss," it would at the same time, in the Quirinal's opinion, arouse the greatest possible hostility of the Little Entente and provoke complications far more serious than those which would follow "Anschluss."

The possibility, however, of ultimate Monarchist restoration in Austria is not therefore excluded but it is emphasized that should this happen Italy's policy would be decided in full agreement with the Little Entente, France and England.

Pope Supports Present Rule

For some time past it has been rumored that Otto might marry Princess Maria, youngest daughter of the King of Italy, and it is this report which is held to be mainly responsible for the alleged change of attitude of the Italian Government on the Austrian monarchical question. Otto's aspirations, however, are receiving no encouragement from the Italian Government.

The attitude of the Vatican on the question is more difficult to define than that of the Italian Government. It is known that the Vatican generally prefers monarchical to republican regime. Since the Hapsburgs are staunch Roman Catholics, the Vatican would obviously see with pleasure their restoration to the Austrian throne. On the other hand the Vatican has been so satisfied with the policy of the Dollfuss regime and with the reforms made in the Austrian constitution that it is doubtful whether the Pope will withdraw the support hitherto given to the present regime in Austria.

Fear of Lightning Held Needless; Bathtub Accidents More Fatal

Fear of lightning is out of all proportion to the number of people killed by it. Automobiles kill thousands of persons to every one killed by lightning. Slipping in the bathtub leads to fatal results hundreds of times more frequently than being hit by a lightning bolt.

If you see the flash of lightning it will never hurt you. If it hits you, you will never know it. This is the philosophy of Charles L. G. Fortescue, research engineer in the Westinghouse Electric Laboratories, who has been playing for years with natural as well as artificial lightning to study its characteristics, according to an article in the New York Herald Tribune of August 11. Here are some of his observations and some of his advice:

What to Do and Not Do

Houses in large cities, particularly in business sections, are, for some unexplained reason, seldom hit by lightning.

If you are playing golf and a thunderstorm comes up, don't try to finish your game—head for the club house.

It is no more dangerous to carry steel golf clubs than wooden ones in a storm.

The increase in hazard due to carrying an umbrella is so small as to be negligible.

Don't seek shelter under an isolated tree in an open space.

A dense woods or forest is reasonably safe.

If in the mountains, especially above the timberline, and caught in a thunderstorm, get as close to the ground as possible. Deep clefts in the rocks or cave-like places are safest.

The safest kind of building is a steel building. When the Empire State Building is hit the occupants are unaware of it.

Houses in the country should be protected. Lihtning rods are effective.

If it were not for the expense, the best protection would be afforded by several heavy grounded wires carried on a well grounded steel mast extended vertically over the house and reaching some distance above its highest point.

Drafts Not Dangerous

It is not dangerous to sit in a draft or near an open window during a lightning storm. Lightning will not come in a window or door. Its best chance of reaching indoors is by way of the chimney.

Lightning does strike twice in the same place. Church spires and tall buildings are hit quite frequently.

It is not dangerous to handle electrical equipment, fans, lights, etc., during a lightning storm. Wiring systems are grounded.

It is only under unusual circumstances that any one is injured by lightning while telephoning. The noises heard in the receiver are not a sign of danger.

It is no more dangerous to have your radio running during a lightning storm than to have it off. Antennas should be supplied with lightning ground connections (arresters).

There is no more danger of being hit by lightning while in swimming than when on dry land, less if anything. If one is close to the point hit currents may pass through the body causing an unpleasant shock, or in rare cases death by drowning.

It is no more dangerous to be near a church steeple than elsewhere when lightning is flashing. Steeples are hit frequently but they are usualy protected by metal roofs adequately grounded.

Automobiles Safe

If driving a car when a lightning storm breaks, seek shelter. One is usually safe in a steel body car, but other factors make driving hazardous.

There is no reason for the practice of keeping cows out of a barn during a lightning storm. The belief that their warm bodies attract lightning is based on superstition. Warm bodies have no greater attraction for electricity than old bodies.

The belief that if cows are milked during a thunderstorm the milk will turn sour is also without foundation. Souring of milk is caused by a specific bacteria, the growth of which is fostered by warmth. If lightning were responsible for the souring of milk it would be as likely to take place inside the cow as outside.

Drought Damage In U.S. About $5,000,000,000

financing by the Federal Land Bank system).

Mr. Westbrook said that this program, if agreed to by farmers, would involve the moving of about 25 per cent of the farm families now on relief rolls in Montana and other Northwestern States. For the country as a whole, it would affect about 10 per cent.

No General Migrations Planned

That program, he went on, is still in its formative stage, and its success will depend largely upon the attitude of the farmers, since none will be forced to move. Also, he emphasized that there would be no general migrations, since each farmer moved would be assisted in establishing himself on a farm in the State where he resides at present.

"I think if we can get the drought situation adjusted," he said, "the net result will be on the profit side of the ledger."

Mr. Roosevelt left Glasgow at 4 P. M. to make the thirty-mile drive to this public works project, where he remained until late in the evening.

With him came Mrs. Roosevelt, Secretary Dern, Senator and Mrs. Wheeler, Governor Frank H. Cooney of Montana and Mrs. Cooney, and a large group of other officials.

Mr. Roosevelt saw 3,000 men at work on the Fort Peck Dam.

Power development here is a secondary consideration since there is comparatively small use for electricity, but the primary unit at the dam will be capable of developing 50,000 horsepower. Should the future develop a growth in power requirements it is estimated that 500,000 horsepower could be developed.

Drought Relief Support Urged

President Roosevelt asked for public support in the administration's drought relief program in his brief talk from the rear platform of his car at Havre, Mont.

The text of his remarks follows:

"I wish I had a loud speaker on the train, but there is none. This is not a political campaign.

"I have never been through this section of Northern Montana and the reason I chose this particular route was because I wanted to learn something at first hand, both by talking to the people and seeing conditions with my own eyes. As you know, we are trying to do a good many new things, but I believe the country understands what we are trying to do and is supporting our effort to make a better living for the average citizen.

"I notice that here we are on the outskirts, the edge, of what we call the secondary drought area. I am glad it has not been any worse here than it actually has.

"We have to provide in the days to come for the elimination not only of the causes of drought, but of the conditions that come from drought. It is going to take a long time to do it, but, as I have said before, I think we are on our way and that you good people understand it and are supporting it.

"I wish I had time to stop off here and spend a little longer time, but I have been away from Washington now for a little over five weeks—it was actually five weeks yesterday—having covered the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, the Canal Zone and Hawaii. I have got to get back to the nation's capital.

"I hope when I come back through here next that things are going to be better than they are today. Many thanks."

The President's party thinned somewhat today when he left Secretary Ickes at Glacier Park and when two of his sons departed by plane for the East. James and Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr. motored from Glacier to Great Falls, Mont., to board an Eastbound plane, James to return to his home at Boston and Franklin to go to Maine to the Summer home of Eldridge Jackson, a Harvard classmate.

At places to be touched in the next few days representatives of the Agriculture and Interior Departments will board the train for conferences such as the one the President had today with Mr. Westbrook.

Jewish Athletes And '36 Olympics

Untermyer Asks U.S. Hebrew Athletes To Boycott Berlin Games

Samuel Untermyer, as president of the Non-Sectarian League to Champion Human Rights, issued an appeal recently to all Jewish athletes to abstain from competing for the 1936 United States Olympic team, on the grounds that, as the games are to be held in Berlin, they would be forced to accept Nazi hospitality. He condemned the action of the American officials in moving to accept the invitation to the games as an attempt to gloss over race discrimination.

"My advice to the athletics and others of world Jewry," he said, "is not only not to compete but to keep as far away as possible from any form of participation in the Olympic athletic games to be held in Berlin in 1936. Out of decent consideration for their race, it is unthinkable that any self-respecting Jew would accept the hospitality of a country that persists in so insulting, degrading and persecuting our people.

"Any man with a Jewish ancestor, with a drop of Jewish blood in his veins, who crosses Germany's border or accepts its hospitality, is deserving only of the contempt of his fellowmen, be they Jews or Christians."

Mr. Untermyer's appeal followed almost immediately the publication in "Olympic News" of an article by Avery Brundage, president of the American Olympic Association, in which he indicated that he would accept the invitation to the 1936 games. Mr. Brundage avoided any direct reference to the racial question, but complimented the Germans upon their preparations and suggested that American athletes begin to get in shape.

"The German committee is making every effort to provide the finest facilities and plans to reproduce the Los Angeles Olympic Village," he wrote. "We should see in the youth at Berlin the forbears of a race of free, independent thinkers accustomed to the democracy of sport; a race disdainful of sharp practice, tolerant of the rights of others and practicing the Golden Rule because it believes in it."

The question of American participation in the 1936 games has been a controversial one for some time. The American Jewish Congress, through its president, Bernard S. Deutsch, took issue several weeks ago with William May Garland, American member of the Olympic Committee, who, after a trip to Germany, returned to report that the German government would in no way discriminate against Jewish athletes at the games. This report was concurred in by several other American members of the committee.

Mr. Untermyer's plea, if taken seriously, will mean the elimination from the United States team trials of such outstanding contenders as Sol Furth, former New York University broad-jumper; Milton Sandler, former New York University middle-distance runner; Ed Eiegel, sprinter of the Swedish-American A. C.; Sam Klopstock, Stanford University hurdler, and William Steiner, German-American A. C. marathon runner.

British Health Ministry Plan To Eliminate Slums

The cost of out-relief in England and Wales in 1933-34 was £16,809,000, as compared with £15,167,000 in 1932-33. The increase of cost is thus 10.8 per cent, and may be compared with an increase of 6.5 per cent in the average number of recipients of outdoor relief. Of the cost, £7,540,000 represents the amount granted to persons ordinarily engaged in some regular occupation, with their dependents, including £3,177,000 granted to insured persons holding the employment exchange card U.I.40, and their dependents. Card U.I.40 is a receipt given at an employment exchange to an insured person when, on becoming unemployed, he deposits his unemployment book at the exchange as a preliminary to obtaining unemployment benefit. The amount of £7,540,000 is equivalent on an average weekly cost per person on 5s. 0¾d. In 1932-33 the amount granted to persons ordinarily engaged in some regular occupations, with their dependents, was £6,461,000, equivalent to 4s. 9½d. a person a week.

The cost of out-relief to the other persons in receipt of domiciliary relief, who are sometimes referred to as the ordinary outdoor poor, was £9,269,000, as compared with £8,706,000 in 1932-33. The average weekly expenditure on relief a head of the ordinary outdoor poor was 6s. 0¼d., compared with 6s. 1d. for 1932-33.

The total expenditure in London on domiciliary relief in money and kind was £1,600,000, and the average weekly cost per person of such relief was 6s. 3d. The corresponding amounts for the previous year were £1,631,000 and 6s. 2½d.

London Plans Changes

The Housing and Public Health Committee of the London County Countil has recently reviewed the types of block dwelings hitherto provided. As a result of inspecting models it has been decided to adopt certain standard types for erection in connexion with the large rehousing schemes which must result from the Council's operations in slum clearance. The types are to be known as 1934 (1), (2), (3), and (4).

In type 1934 (1) the areas of the rooms are similar to those of the existing type A, but the following improvements have been decided on: there will be a higher standard of finish; walls are to be plastered instead of rendered, and other wall will be fair-faced instead brickwork and internal woodwork will be painted instead of stained; and two drying rooms will be provided in each block by omitting a three-room tenement on the first floor and a two-room tenement on the third floor. These drying rooms will be made easily accessible to all tenants.

The following additional amenities are to be provided: a dresser with doors instead of hanging shelves; a hanging cupboard instead of a metal canopy in one bedroom; a portable kitchener instead of an open grate in the living room; a larger copper and a deeper sink in the kitchen; and a hot-water supply to the bath by means of a syphon.

Type 1934 (2) is to be a variation of type 1934 (1). The sizes of the rooms are the same, but common washhouses are provided in the proportion of one to three tenements on each floor, and the drying rooms are omitted as the washhouses will be adapted for drying purposes. A gas water-heater is fitted to provide hot water for the bath. In the washhouse a gas copper, washing trough, and a table are provided. A cold-water supply is taken to the trough and copper, with an arrangement for discharging hot water from the copper to the washing trough. Additional amenities are provided as in type 1934 (1), except that there will not be a copper in the kitchen.

Larger Rooms

Type 1934 (3) is similar in arrangement to type 1934 (1) so far as the provision of drying rooms is concerned, but the rooms in the tenements are larger. The following amenities are provided:—A larder and a dresser with doors are fitted in the kitchen to leave the living room unencumbered; a mantel register grade is provided in the living room unencumbered; a manted stove; and a hanging cupboard is fitted in one bedroom. The bath and water-closet are in separate compartments entered from the lobby; a wash-hand basin is fitted in the bathroom; a gas heater is provided for heating water for the bath; a serving batch is placed between the kitchen and the living room in all but the end tenements, where it is impracticable; and the height of room is increased.

Type 1934 (4) has the larger rooms and amenities of type 1934 (3) but common wash-houses are provided, drying rooms being omitted as in type 1934 (2).

So far as the exigencies will allow, access to the bedrooms will be from lobbies. It is not possible to obviate entirely bedrooms being approached through a living room, but arrangements will be made to ensure that not more than one bedroom in any dewelling shall open off the living room.

Having regard to the areas of rooms and the added amenities of types 1934 (3) and (4), the gross rental value of these types will be from 2s to 2s. 6d. a week more than that of types 1934 (2) and (3).

The planning and amenities of the new types of dwellings will be subject to review in the light of experience.

Discharged Maid Sues For $10,000

Supreme Court Judge Hears Case Of Domestic Fired After 30 Years

Miss Jennie A. Anderson, who, according to her story told to Supreme Court Justice William F. Bleakley, of White Plain, N.Y., was discharged a year ago as a domestic by her employers of thirty years because she asked for interest on a loan she gave them, started an action recently to collect, says a dispatch to the New York Times.

Miss Anderson sought summary judgment in a foreclosure proceeding brought on a chattel mortgage given to her by Mrs. Ella A. Rolfe of Smith Avenue, of White Plains, to secure a loan of $10,000. Mrs. Rolfe's husband, the late Dr. Edward Rolfe, member of a wealthy Boston family, died in March.

Joseph A. Mitchell, counsel for Miss Anderson, told the court his client was employed as a child by the Rolfes as a domestic in Boston and had worked with the family thirty years, ending her employment about a year ago when, she alleged, she was "fired" because she asked for interest on her loans to her employers.

Mitchell said she had accumulated about $12,000 during her thirty years' work by thrifty use of the tips she earned as a waitress in a New York restaurant operated by the Rolfes and later as an employe of a beauty parlor established by the Rolfes in this city. He said she loaned them $5,000 to buy a home here and paid most of the expenses of the beauty parlor.

When the mortgage on the Rolfe home, for which she had lent the money to buy, was foreclosed, Miss Anderson took the chattel mortgage to protect Mrs. Rolfe from loss of her household possessions. The present suit is a foreclosure on the chattel mortgage.

Mitchell told the court that Miss Anderson recently has been attending night school. Although she is about 40 years old, she is intent, he said, on obtaining the education which she could never afford unless she got back her money.

Wallace Warns Of Crop Control Due To Drought

New Jersey farmers were concerned the government could promise no "magic solution" for their troubles. "We cannot disregard the economic law with impunity," he explained. "To do so will be to get into trouble, as both Federal and state officials who have had their fingers burned know."

The Secretary saw a hope for an increase in foreign purchasing power for farm products in the reciprocal agreements now being negotiated. Lowered tariffs or curtailed crops, he said, are the immediate means of opening foreign markets.

Refers to Ogden L. Mills

Referring to Ogden L. Mills, former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Wallace questioned whether he would advocate lower tariffs if he was in the administration which is in power and added "the thing for you to do whether you be an old or a new dealer is to get the tariffs slashed in half. Those of you who are real old dealers and don't want any government interference with private business should take that course."

Mr. Wallace said that if Republicans came back into power they would have to adopt the Democratic program for the relief of farmers.

"Unless the Republicans worked with the farmers in keeping down surpluses," he said, "they would have to build up for another explosion by resuming heavy loans to Europe or they would have to lower tariffs much more rapidly than we are doing, both of which would be damaging in the long run to the United States."

Denies Restriction Is Harmful

He denies that the program of restriction of farm products had been harmful, even in view of the wide-spread drought famine. For instance, he said, although 12,000,000 acres had been withdrawn from corn production, enough hogs had been destroyed to save 300,000,000 bushels of corn which those animals would have eaten had they lived.

The policy of lending money to foreign countries which began in 1920 eased the force of the depression, the speakers said, by maintaining purchasing power but to renew such a policy now would only "build up another explosion."

Both Mr. Wallace and William B. Duryee, State Secretary of Agriculture, agreed that price fixing is "decidedly unwise" and both urged cooperation between the New Jersey truck growers and dairymen and those in other states. The former however, sounded a warning against too rapidly advancing prices.

The Most Wideawake Man in the World

That honor unquestionably goes to Gregory Gorman of Maryville, Mo., who hasn't had a wink of of sleep in 13 years. That many years ago, Gorman found he just couldn't sleep and then found he could get along just as well without sleeping at all. So, to keep busy, he started to work on two jobs, one during the day and another at night, and spends his spare time either reading or writing, being a newspaper columnist by profession. He eats six meals every day, is in the best of health, and enjoys life in his fullest despite his sleepless years.

House on the Sands

The scriptural adage about the man who built his house upon sand does not apply in the instance of the old Pan House, Limekilns, Great Britain, which has stood for 300 years on sand and survived the fury of the elements overlooking the Firth of Forth. It has not been occupied for all that time, and for many years it has been gradually going to decay. Part of its red-tiled roof has now fallen in but notwithstanding its sandy foundation its walls are as solid today as they were when erected.

US Marines Lower Flag After 19 Years In Haiti

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Aug. 6—The United States flag nineteen years over the Marine Corps barracks at Cap Haitien, on the north coast of Haiti, was lowered today and the Haitian flag was raised in its place.

Both Haitian and United States officials took part in the simple ceremony marking the withdrawal of the United States forces from the military post and good-feeling was evident on both sides.

The Stars and Stripes were lowered by Lieut. Col. McClellan of the Marine Corps.

All the marines in Haiti are being concentrated at Port-au-Prince and the final ceremonies of withdrawal will probably take place on the morning of Aug. 15, when the marines are to sail for the United States.

Realities Draw Yugoslavs Into German Camp

Small States Are Not Trusting Statesmanship Of Great European Powers

The Serbs, Austrians and Hungarians who began the last war are resigned, twenty years later, to the probability of the next. As small states they see a situation beyond their own control, and they do not trust the statesmanship of the great powers, says a recent article in the New York Herald Tribune.

Prussian bayonets already cast their long shadows into Central Europe and confront the little allies of France and Italy alike with the prospect of a new and mighty Germany sweeping down from the North Sea to the Adriatic.

All Eyes on the Big Powers

What will France, Britain and Italy do about the equality of rights and the equality of arms for Germany? What will re-armed Germany do about the system created by the Treaty of Versailles? These are questions Belgrade, Vienna and Budapest are asking.

If the new Germany can achieve the power of the old, then the fate of Austria is plain, the aspirations of Hungary are given a new direction, and the Little Entente is divided in aims and perhaps even destroyed as a political unit.

Economics Blurs Other Issues

This is the prospect which seems to give the Danubian countries a community of interest in opposing Germany. Ministers in the government of Belgrade and Budapest and even Vienna indicate clearly, however, that for them the reverse is true. They offer three general reasons.

First, their conviction that Germany will be completely re-armed in three years weighs more with Austria and Hungary and the Petite Entente than either the policies of their allies or the shock their people suffered by the murder of Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss. It is no accident that while public opinion suffered a revulsion of feeling against Germany, the press in Hungary and Yugoslavia carried no word of criticism and that in Austria the government accepted Franz von Papen as minister.

Second, Germany took the agricultural produce of the Danubian basin before the war, and Germany remains the one great potential market. Yugoslavia and Hungary recently have signed advantageous commercial treaties with Germany, and Austria hopes soon to reach both trade and tourist agreements with Berlin.

Third, Anschluss is considered inevitable, not only in Belgrade and Budapest, but also in Vienna. Austria cannot live without foreign aid, and was supported by a League of Nations loan even during the boom days of prosperity. The French and other schemes for a Danubian customs union are believed to be foredoomed because they would call for readjustments which none of the small states can undergo. Finally, the Austrian people are German, and will eventually become part of the German Fatherland.

To these general reasons must be added the special reasons why certain countries in Central Europe look to Berlin as a potential friend or ally, and why the balance of power is shifting dangerously in the area around which so many of Europe's wars in the past were fought.

Hungary finds Germany the only great power which can champion her claims to the lost territories and to the equality of rights. Hungary lives in constant fear, too, that "when or wherever war comes," the Petite Entente will destroy her unless some great army is ready to defend the Hungarians. Hungary is allied with Italy, but she is pursuing a policy which might make German regiments that great defending army.

Yugoslavia looks to Germany as the one power which can checkmate Italy and strengthen Yugoslavia's policy in Albania and the Adriatic. It is significant that governmental spokesmen here inform this correspondent that if Italy attempts to restore the Hapsburgs, Yugoslavia will join Poland in supporting Anschluss.

The dangers of shifting into an alliance with one great power or another are plain to these countries. But lying between the great powers, who are unable to reconcile their interests, they argue that they have no choice. Jockeys for the position are regretful that the great powers have not yet built a League of Nations to which a small state can go alone, without allies or champions, to demand justice and equality of treatment.

Italy Smarting From Check To Danube Dream

Opposition Of Little Entente Taken To Mean Slavs Prefer Anschluss To Rome

A rude shock has been administered to Italian foreign policy as an aftermath of the crisis over Austria. Moving troops to the border may have been effective as a means of preserving Austrian independence in a moment of actual danger, but in the last analysis the policy of Premier Benito Mussolini in that direction is—or was—based on other means, says Joseph P. Phillips in an article to the New York Herald Tribune from Rome recently.

Chief among them was the plan for Danubian cooperation, which already had been put into effect, so far as Italy, Austria and Hungary are concerned, but which, for anything like complete fulfilment, presupposed eventual cooperation of the countries of the Little Entente, and at least a minimum of hostility on the part of Germany.

Under the circumstances, Italy may be willing to write off an open and ugly quarrel with Germany as inevitable. The short duration allowed the campaign of the Fascist press against Germany and the almost complete taboo since placed on mention even of the name of that country in public discussions may be taken as indicative of a desire to avoid aggravating a break with Hitler.

Its disappointments are recognized without admitting that they cannot ever be overcome. Disappointment has been the most unexpected, hence most resented, as regards the attitude of the Little Entente.

The deep hostility shown by Yugoslavia to the protective attitude of Italy toward Austria, and the only slightly reduced display of feeling in Czechoslovaka, have served both as a surprise and warning to this country. Until the very day of the assassination of Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss and the march of the Italian troops to the border, there had been a feeling in Rome that some progress was being made toward persuading the other countries in Central Europe to join with Italy, Austria and Hungary in that economic and political cooperation which was looked upon as about the only substitute for "Anschluss."

Today that hope appears to have been given a severe jolt. Moreover, the display of hostility from Central Europe has warned Italy that the often vaunted French domination of the Little Entente has limits. Perhaps in its way the revelation of Yugoslav backing of the Nazi movement in Austria shocked the Italians more than did the evidences of the German hand in the events. Germany's part already had been assumed; apparently the danger from Yugoslavia had been underestimated by many. In Italy only one conclusion can be drawn: the Little Entente would prefer to see Austria absorbed by Germany rather than protected by Mussolini.

Even Austria Is Slipping

Among the inconveniences of such an attitude some have immediate importance. With Dr. Dollfus gone, the new Austrian government has found in the hostility of the Little Entente toward its relations with Italy an addition to its many difficulties. As soon as the new Austrian Chancellor left for a trip to Budapest, hostile critics in Central Europe seemed to have begun interpreting the move as a sign of the desire to escape the Italian bond. Perhaps the line of reasoning was somewhat confused, but its existence did make the trip of Prince Ernst Rudiger von Starhemberg to Mussolini immediately afterward seem like a reassuring gesture.

It is to this same unfriendly source that the recent flurry of rumors over the possibilities of a monarchical restoration in Austria and Hungary has been attributed. Obviously there are many elements present to start imaginations moving in such a direction. Nor has there ever been any reason to consider Italian opposition to restoration beyond alteration. Realizing, however, all the complications certain to follow—and particularly in relation to that very Little Entente which to Italy appears to represent about the most dangerous because the most incalculable element in the situation—there appears no fault to find with the official Italian version of the attitude toward restoration. That version is that aside from any other considerations, and attempt at restoration at present would be opposed as inopportune and perilous.

100 Slain, 300 Hurt As Arabs, Jews Clash In Algeria

Jewish Soldier's Invasion Of Mosque In Constantine Is Blamed For The Rioting

Another bloodstained page was added over this week-end to Algeria's long and lurid history of anti-Jewish disorders, when scores were killed and injured in riots between Arab Moslems and Jews at Constantine, says the New York Times in an article from Paris dated August 6.

(At least 100 persons were killed and 300 wounded at Constantine, according to The Associated Press).

Algeria has for centuries been a hotbed of anti-Jewish feeling, which now and again flares up in brief but vicious clashes that the local police quickly control, but it is rare that riots of such gravity occur.

The latest trouble started like an ordinary small clash, but it ended with troops, policemen, gendarmes and firemen being rushed from Algiers, Philippeville and Selma, with Governor General Jules Carde dashing back to Algiers from Paris by plane tonight, and with Constantine itself like a besieged city, its streets bristling with machine guns, its shops and houses barricaded and its populace remaining fearfully within their homes.

Soldier Invaded Mosque

The rioting was reported to have begun Saturday evening when a drunken Jewish soldier named Eli Kalifa staggered into a mosque at the hour of prayer and started loudly cursing the worshippers. Infuriated Moslems not only made short work of him, but dashed into the streets sowing fear and discord.

Arousing their coreligionists, they swept down to the Jewish quarter of the city and from that time until dawn, when they were too exhausted to continue, both sides fought with whatever weapons were at their disposal.

Yesterday morning the authorities called together the Jewish and Moslem leaders, and after a friendly conference both sides agreed to suspend hostilities. But the delegates had hardly left the meeting when passions flared up anew and with increased force.

Moslems Gather

Bands of Moslems gathered from every direction, coming even from the suburbs, and bore down on the Jewish part of the city, beating the Jews they encountered on the streets, breaking into houses and demolishing shops, which they looted and burned. Most of the Jewish shops in Constantine are reported to have been destroyed.

A typical incident occurred on the Avenue Anatole France, where marauders waylaid a bus, seized a Jew from among the passengers, and stoned him to death. The bloodiest clash took place on the city's most important street, the Rue Nationale, where Jews gathered en masse to meet the Moslem mob and a veritable battle was fought with bludgeons, knives, revolvers and stones.

At that time the local authorities gave up hope of being able to quell the riot unaided, and an alarm was sent to neighboring towns and to Algiers. In the afternoon a battalion of Senegalese troops, a detachment of firemen and a brigade of gendarmes from Algiers arrived in Constantine. Last night three troop trains carrying reinforcements from Algiers reached the scene of the disorder.

According to the latest reports, order reigned today, but passions still run high and the authorities were not sure the volcano they were sitting on would not blow up again.

Martial Law Is Declared

CONSTANTINE, Algeria, Aug. 6—Authorities estimated that at least 100 persons were massacred and 300 wounded in Constantine alone after savage fighting broke out anew late today in the religious war between Arabs and Jews.

Martial law was declared tonight and Senegalese troops were attempting to restore order to Constantine and the near-by Port of Philippeville. Killings were also reported at Hamma, Jemmapes and Bizet.

Special trains were bringing all available colonial troops into the city. Machine guns were set up at strategic spots throughout the Jewish quarter and patrols of soldiers were marching through the principal streets.

Military authorities ordered that all traffic cease and cafes were closed.

Argentina To Issue Book On Falkland Isles Claim

BUENOS AIRES, Aug. 18—Argentina's Congress has appropriated 30,000 pesos (about $9,000) to translate and publish a French book supporting her claim to the Falkland Islands, which she has demanded formally from Great Britain every year for a century. The book, "Les Iles Maloulnes," French equivalent of Malvinas Islands, was written by Paul Groussac.

A passage in the original version which declared "Great Britain, without any title of sovereignty, took possession of them (the Falkland Islands) by force," was deleted by order of a Senate committee.

Argentina holds that the islands were Spanish territory and passed to Argentina when independence was gained in 1810.

Europe Fears Anarchy More Than Early War

rot away. That course, if it should be permitted to persist, would appear to tend more toward revolution and anarchy than toward a general European war. To be precise, take Germany. Until June 30's amazing purge the Nazis' formidable militarization program and their Storm Troops machine of 2,500,000 men, raised the serious threat of eventual war in Europe—if their militarism were maintained unchecked for another three to five years.

By his own riddling of the Brown Shirt ranks, Chancellor Adolf Hitler has removed much of that immediate danger. Certainly he has dislocated, temporarily at least, Germany's own internal strength. Some observers incline to believe that the very jeopardizing of Hitler's force may drive him more rapidly into foreign adventure, desperately intended to save his dictatorship.

While admitting that Hitler appears to have demonstrated his incalculable weakness for precipitant action, this writer is among those who would prefer to trust the caution of the Reichswehr general staff to the judgment of a Roehm or a Heines. With Hitler dependent upon the Reichswehr for support, it would seem that Germany's professional generals would not now be pushed easily into risking an almost certain defeat in another war.

The danger of an Italian-Yugoslav clash on Austrian territory would appear much greater, but there Great Britain's influence upon Rome would be as significant in sedative value as France's influence upon Belgrade. And Hitler's recent acts have immensely solidified Anglo-French cooperation in the interest of preserving order in Europe. No one can deny that momentous events are to be expected in Europe next winter, but only a maniac would start a fire in a hospital ward. Europe's hospital ward won't be vacated of patients for a long time yet, and that fact ought to count for something.

Court Restricts Pulitzer Heirs In Making Wills

Foley Rules They Cannot So Dispose Of Interests In 'Newspaper Trust'

Surrogate James A. Foley ruled on August 18 that heirs of Joseph Pulitzer, who brought "The New York World" to its late eminence, were not entitled to dispose through wills of their interest in Mr. Pulitzer's "newspaper trust." The Surrogate contended that provisions of the Pulitzer will affecting the "newspaper trust" were not nullified by court order permitting the sale in 1931 of the "World" and "The Evening World" to the Scripps-Howard interests, to be merged into the "World-Telegram," say the New York Herald Tribune.

Cash obtained by the Pulitzer heirs for the stock of the Press Publishing Company, which published "The World" and "The Evening World," resulted from an eventuality not contemplated by the elder Pulitzer, who had strictly bound his heirs not to dispose of the stock other than through controlled clauses of the will, the court held.

Reinvestments to Remain Intact

Reinvestments of cash proceeds from the sale of the stock, changing the nature of the "newspaper trust" holdings, are to remain intact until the deaths of the testator's two youngest sons, Joseph Pulitzer Jr. and Herbert Pulitzer, the Surrogate ruled.

Upon both their deaths the "newspaper trust" is to be divided equally among the male heirs of Mr. Pulitzer's five children, Ralph, Joseph Jr., Herbert, Mrs. Edith P. Moore and Mrs. Constance P. Elmslie.

"The World" and "The Evening World" were bought by the Scripps-Howard interests for $5,000,000 following a decision by Surrogate Foley on Feb. 27, 1931, granting Ralph, Joseph and Herbert Pulitzer permission to sell the papers because of financial losses, which they claimed were imperiling the Pulitzer estate.

A construction of the will had been requested by the heirs on the ground that a provision of the will allowed that each of Mr. Pulitzer's children might appoint one male heir to inherit a share of the "newspaper trust."

Former State Senator Thomas I. Sheridan guardian for the granddaughters of the elder Pulitzer, contended that his wards' parents might make "deeds" disposing upon their death of their interests in the proceeds of the sale of the newspapers. Inheritances might be forfeited if no such documents were drawn, he warned.

This contention was overruled by Surrogate Foley, who held that the provision of the elder Pulitzer's will authorizing disposal of interest in the "newspaper trust" by wills of his heirs had been nullified. A preceding provision in the will—that which provides for the division of the "newspaper trust" among the male heirs of the testator's children upon the death of Joseph Pulitzer Jr. and Herbert Pulitzer—is— extant, the court ruled.

"The immediate question here," explained the Surrogate, "involves the power of the children of Mr. Pulitzer under the provisions of Article 11 of the first codicil of Article 21 of the will, (a) to appoint heirs to the remainder of the proceeds of the sale of the stock of the Press Publishing Company, or (b) to appoint heirs to the remainder of the stock of the Pulitzer Publishing Company (publishers of "The St. Louis Post Dispatch) or the proceeds of its sale.

"In my opinion no power of appointment of heirs exists in any of the children of the testator over the stock of either of these companies or the proceeds of the sale of said stock. As to the Press Publishing Company, the basis of my determination that no power of appointment exists, is the fact that the power was specifically limited to the stock itself and not to the proceeds of its sale.

Sale Nullified Naming of Heirs

"The power of appointment was inseparably interwoven with the provisions of the will, which prohibited the sale of the stock of the Press Publishing Company.

"The sale of the stock of that company under judicial authority necessarily nullified the power of appointment of heirs attached to that imperative retention of the stock within the trust. In the composition of the 'newspaper trust,' distinction was clearly made by the testator between the stock of the two publishing companies placed in the corpus of the trust.

"As to the Pulitzer Publishing Company, which published the 'Post Dispatch, authority was given to the trustees to sell its stock. As to the Press Publishing Company stock, which published the 'World,' there was a prohibition against the sale of the stock.

Pulitzer's Dead Hand in Control

"The provisions of article eleventh of the first codicil created a power of appointment of heirs in the children of Mr. Pulitzer over the stock of the Press Publishing Company but this power was attached to the stock itself and contemplated the retention of the stock in kind until the termination of the trust. That article in no way mentioned or applied the power of appointment of heirs to the Pulitzer Publishing Company stock.

"So long as these New York newspapers would continue to be published the dead hand of Mr. Pulitzer under his testamentary plan, would control their management. Economic necessity destroyed Mr. Pulitzer's program, and along with the imperative sale of the stock of the Press Publishing Company, every restriction contained in the will relating to the inheritance, appointment of heirs or management of the stock was nullified.

"Thus there were certain provisions of the 'newspaper trust' which permitted participation by editors and managers of the 'World' in the income of the trust fund. These provisions necessarily failed when the stock was sold and when the publication of the newspaper was surrendered by the trustees of the estate."

Succession Unaffected by Wills

The "specific term" of the "newspaper trust" ends upon the deaths of both Herbert and Joseph Pulitzer Jr., the court held.

"I accordingly hold," said Surrogate Foley, "that the succession to the remainder of the 'newspaper trust' is not affected in any manner by the wills of the sons and daughters of other descendants of the testator; that all the stock and the proceeds of the sale of the stock within the 'newspaper trust' pass under the provisions of the sixth article of the first codicil and that such remainder provisions are valid and effective."

Ralph Pulitzer and Joseph Pulitbel Jr., were represented by Jackson, Fuller, Nash and Brophy, of 15 Broadway; the grandsons of the testator by Vincent L. Leibell, of 51 Chambers Street, and the trustees of the estate by Rogers H. Bacon, of 102 Maiden Lane.

Ford Motor Co. To Smelt Own Iron In Britain

Has Just Completed Erection Of 500-Ton Capacity Blast Furnace At Dagenham

The Ford Motor Co. has just completed the erection of the latest blast furnace in Great Britain at Dagenham. This furnace which has a capacity of 500 tons in 24 hours, is the first blast furnace to be put into operation on the banks of the Thames. It brings a new industry to the South of England for, hitherto, iron smelting has been confined to the North Country, the Midlands and South Wales. It completes the chain of plants which gives the Ford organization complete control over every stage of the manufacture of the car from the iron ore to the complete vehicle.

Ford engineers have tackled the problem of iron smelting by applying processes new to the industry in Great Britain.

The furnace is located approximately midway between the jetty where the ships carrying the ore, coal and limestone are unloaded and the foundry where the castings are made. Adjacent to it are the coke ovens which supply the high grade coke fuel necessary for the blast furnace. This arrangement reduces the handling time to a minimum.

Two electric unloaders, each capable of dealing with 300 tons per hour, unload the ships into electric transfer cars which carry the coal to the coke ovens and the ore and limestone to the stockyards which have a capacity of 100,000 tons. Here an electric travelling crane lifts the ore and limestone into hoppers from which electric railway trucks carry it to the charging skips that lift it to the top of the blast furnace.

The pressure of the air blast in the furnace has, in the past, made it difficult to utilize ore dust, coke breize and iron borings from the factory because the light nature of the material allowed it to be blown out of the furnace.

To overcome this the iron borings, ore dust and coke breize are each loaded into an appropriate hopper. There are five of these each opening on a rotating table onto which the material is allowed to fall at a regulated speed. A scraper feeder directs the material onto a belt conveyor which deals with the five tables. In this manner the correct proportions of each material are assured. The material is then thoroughly mixed in a rotary mixer and fed onto a wide chain grate and baked into a cake under a burner fired by coke oven gas. This cake, termed sinter, after being cooled, is broken up ready to be taken to the furnace. Ths process, which is known as sintering results in considerable economy in the operation of the blast furnace.

The skips that carry the sinter and the charges of limestone, iron ore and coke to the top of the furnace discharge into a funnel, known as the upper bell, which automatically opens to receive the charge, below it, inside the furnace, is a rotary distributor, known as the lower bell, which distributes it evenly to every part of the furnace.

The slag and molten metal from the furnace are run off into different troughs from which they fall into separate ladles mounted on bogie railway trucks of special design. The slag is sold for road making while the molten metal is transported the short distance which separates the furnace from the hot metal shop. Each ladle has a capacity of 75 tons of metal.

An electric hoist lifts the ladle by hooking on the trunions at its side and a further hoist tips its contents into the 600 ton hot metal mixer. There it is mixed with a proportion of steel before being used in the hot metal shop in the making of castings for Ford cars.

Wedgwood Benn Tells Of Round-The-World Trip

Gen. Araki Among Celebrities, British Labor Leader Met On Recent Tour

Mr. Wedgwood Benn, Secretary for India in the Labor Government, and Mrs. Benn, just returned from a 35,000 miles tour of the world, talked of some of the world celebrities they met and of the problem of the nations of the world to a representative of Herald London.

There was the dead Chancellor Dollfuss in Vienna. "In December last, when I met Dollfuss, the Social Democrats predicted an overthrow of the Government," said Mr. Benn. "Dictators lead dangerous lives."

And Goering, moving a resolution in the Reichstag at Christmas:—

"All the M.P.'s as we would call them, rose to attention like soldiers, mostly in Nazi uniform, with a click of the heels which resounded through the hall, and voted en bloc!!

A Big Man

"I could not help thinking how utterly hopeless it would be to indulge in a similar Parliamentary drill at Westminister—or how long it is likely to last in Germany."

And Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate for the United States Presidency—for Mr. and Mrs. Benn moved on to America.

"A very big man is Norman Thomas, well over six feet, typical of so many American presidents in the past; big in body, big in soul.

"An uncompromising Socialist as well as a clergyman, who takes the view that as things are moving there is a great danger of Industrial Fascism—State control of industry in the interests of the possessing classes and entrenched industrialists.

"Socialism is faced with difficulties in America, but the transition is ahead."

Henry Ford, the motor magnate, during an hour's chat in his office and a tour of the giant motor plant, discussed very earnestly with the Benns the subject of reincarnation.

"He told me," said Mrs. Benn, "that he believed he himself had been on earth many times before."

Visited Far East

General Araki also comes into the picture, for the Benns were in Japan during cherry blossom time.

"He looks on any agreement between Japan and the Soviet as quite impossible in the present circumstances. It is war and readiness for war in the Far East," remarked Mr. Benn.

In China the tourists had a glimpse of General Chiang Kai-shek, the Christian soldier, who directs his present campaign in Kiangsi from a Christian mission room.

"General Chiang was secretary to the famous Sun Yat Sen, who was kidnapped in London by the Chinese Embassy. He married Sun Yat Sen's sister and is now the biggest man in China.

"More war and little prospect of peace. The Nanking Government has become a permanency, but it is faced with an enormous problem owing to the intense poverty of the peasants."

At Moscow the travellers met M. and Madame Litvinov, rejoicing in the difference in Europe's attitude to Russia today as compared with what it was when Mr. Benn was in Russia eight years ago.

Says M. Litvinov: "What was the policy to Russia of the few is now the policy of many Governments."

Summing up his impressions, Mr. Benn said to me:

"The universal trouble today is the dislocation of the economic machine, and we saw three distinct treatments of the problem. They are all based

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

U.S. President But For One Vote

Senator Benjamin Franklin Wade of Ohio (1800-1878) was President when Andrew Johnson was being tried by the U.S. Senate on charges involving his impeachment in 1868. Out of 54 senators present, 35 voted for Johnson's conviction, while 19 voted for acquittal. Since a conviction required 2/3 of the vote (or 36 out of 54), President Johnson was acquitted by one vote.

By the same single vote Senator Wade missed becoming President of the United States in accordance with the provision of the Constitution.

A Golfer's Thrill

On January 28, 1934, Ralph McKeehan of Bellingham, Washington, accomplished the almost impossible by taking only three putts on the last six holes of the local course. McKeehan chipped in from 40 yards on the 13th hole, made the 14th in one, used one putt on the 15th, chipped in from 60 yards on the 16th, and used only one putt each for the 17th and 18th holes—to the utter astonishment of his partners.

Explorers to See Fiery Vesuvius

Italians To Crawl Deep Into Volcano To Seek Secret Of Its Eruptions

Scientists assembled in Naples on August 11 for an exploration of the bowels of the earth. The adventure will rival the exploits of modern scientists into the stratosphere or the ocean depths.

Vesuvius, the sleeping giant which awakes at intervals over the centuries to spew fiery and poisonous death on mankind, destroying cities and spreading desolation over the landscape, will be explored completely for the first time, says the New York Herald Tribune.

With the volcano now in one of its quiet periods, a daring band will descend into the crater to discover facts about one of the great scourges of man.

The crater has been entered before, but mostly for adventure and more or less superficial examination. This time Italian scientists will make a complete survey, with a hope of throwing light on the action of volcanoes.

The expedition is under the auspices of the National Council of Research, of which Guglielmo Marconi, scientist, and inventor of wireless telegraphy, is president. The explorers will try to determine whether the central tunnel down into the boiling rock in the earth's interior is vertical or curved; whether the sides of the interior are smooth or honeycombed with caverns, and the depth from which the main lava flow comes.

Investigation of the curvature of the tunnel and its possible caverns, which might result in showing that the internal lava flow is blocked so that it results after a long period in a tremendous explosion such as that which destroyed Pompeii, may disclose facts of vast importance to Naples and its vicinity.

It was believed even possible, in the light of the scientific findings, that means might be found of tunnelling into the sides of the vast crater to relieve pressure when necessary, and avert disastrous eruptions.

Vesuvius, one of the world's most famous volcanoes, is on the Bay of Naples. It blows its head off at intervals, frequently with frightful results. The eruptions vary its altitude, which averages about 4,000 feet, but it is sometimes several hundred feet more or less.

Scientists have determined that the present crater, vast and destructive as it is, is only a small part of an incredibly greater crater which existed before the dawn of history.

The worst recorded explosion of Vesuvius came in 79 B. C., when the mountain shook itself in fury and emitted a rain of rocks, ashes, poison gas and molten rock that destroyed

Postal Strike Called In Cuba; Reds Accused

Walkout Paralyzes Wire And Mail Systems; Army Is Ready For Trouble

At least two high Cuban government officials accused Communists of instigating the general strike which paralyzed the governmental postal and telegraph system on August 11 and of being directly responsible for the tension reigning over Cuba in connection with the celebration tomorrow of the first anniversary of the downfall of former President Gerardo Machado, says an article to the New York Herald Tribune from Havana.

All government buildings remained closed on the first of the three days' holiday decreed by the Cabinet. Armed forces throughout the island were held in readiness since this morning, when revolutionaries announced that they would "clean the government of all signs of the Machado regime."

Miguel Suarez, Secretary of Communications, who narrowly escaped injury this afternoon when one striker was injured and three were arrested in a riot in front of the Havana cental postoffice, said tonight:

Blames Communist Agitators

"I have been assured that Communist agitations are responsible for the walkout of government employes from my department. Their move was purely political, and their chief motive was to provoke disorders which would embarrass the government."

The government strike, which was considered one of the most serious problems of the administration of President Carlos Mendieta, came as a surprise. The leaders of the movement appeared at the Communications Office soon after 6 a. m. and stayed just long enough to present seventeen demands to Secretary Suarez. These included provisions for increases in wage scales, payment of bonuses, guarantees against dismissal and immediate removal of "Machadista elements."

A heavy artillery guard was ordered to strategic points in the wire systems to prevent sabotage, and it was learned that the army signal corps was planning to operate the telegraph systems. Mail deliveries throughout the island was paralyzed and it was reported that the President had been given twelve hours to meet the demands, on threats that failure would result in widespread sabotage.

Street Demonstrations

Gabriel Landa, Secretary of the Treasury, admitted that he expected trouble in his department, accusing Communists and "other extremists" of inciting his 2,000 workers to strike.

"No manner of street demonstrations will be permitted" in tomorrow's celebrations, government leaders emphatically declared.

Nevertheless, it was learned that many radical groups have laid definite plans for attacks on men and organizations allegedly closely connected with Cuba's former dictator, Machado, who recently fled from the United States to the Dominican Republic.

Two bombs caused considerable damage this morning in the fashionable Vedado residential district. One exploded at the home of Alexandro Teixidor, a merchant, and the other at the residence of Julio Ortiz Casonova, former Federal attorney.

The two Americans, Frederick Willcox and Arthur B. Needham, held for the last week by Cuban authorities for gun-running, were started back to the United States today aboard the S. S. Cuba.

The hunt for Machadistas apparently began this morning when radicals snatched Saul Herrera, brother of General Alberto Herrera, former army chief of staff, from his bed and took him for a ride. It was reported that he was later released or escaped unharmed.

Three European Housing Experts Urge New Plans

Sir Raymond Unwin Warns Of Hasty Planning; Private Projects Proposed

How European nations have taken advantage of the depression to improve housing conditions was told here by three foreign housing experts as they began a tour of inspection that will take them to thirty-six American cities and aid them in formulating a long-range housing program to guide Federal and municipal housing officials, says the New York Times: on August 11.

The story follows:

Sir Raymond Unwin, former president of the Royal Academy of Architects and England's leading authority on city planning, and Miss A. Mellor Samuel, member of the council of the Society of Women Housing Estate Managers of Great Britain, described England's steps toward better housing. Ernest Kahn, former manager of the municipal-housing developments at Frankfort-am-Main, Germany, told of advances in that country.

As defined by Ernest J. Bohn, chairman of the housing committee of the Cleveland City Council and president of the National Association of Housing Officials, which is sponsor of the tour, the purpose of the experts' survey is not to convince the United States of the need for low-cost public housing.

"We believe all that is water over the dam," Mr. Bohn said. "There is no longer any question that we have embarked on a public housing program. It is our hope that these foreign authorities will be able to assist us in the light of the errors and the progress made abroad."

Both Sir Raymond and Mr. Kahn agreed that housing construction pointed a way out of the slump. In England, Sir Raymond said, low interest rates and reduced costs fostered housing activity by private investors. He was surprised to observe that in this country adverse industrial conditions halted construction and building flourished only when costs were at a peak.

The source of much of England's housing difficulty, in Sir Raymond's opinion, was the speed with which construction proceeded in the year after the war.

"We made a big mistake," he said, "in trying to build twice as many houses in a single year as we had men or materials. It was a worthy effort, but it was just like trying to put a quart into a pint pot."

Mr. Kahn called attention to a reduction in the size of families and a consequent need for emphasis on the planning of small apartments. He warned against direct municipal ownership of public housing projects, favoring instead a corporation largely controlled by the city as an antidote to political maneuvers.

Henry Wright, New York architect and city planner, who with Mr. Bohn will accompany the party on its tour, declared most post-war houses in this country were obsolescent by European standards at the time of their erection.

"We were putting up houses twenty years behind those of England and Holland," Mr. Wright said. "We were building horses and buggies instead of automobiles. One of the great objectives of our government housing will be to investigate housing improvements. We have learned in Europe not to crowd the land, and we are tending already toward greater openness of land. Crowding brings obsolescence."

The first American projects visited by the group were the Rockefeller-financed Paul Laurence Dunbar apartments for Negro residents in Harlem and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union development in the Bronx. Although the members of the party asked questions and expressed polite interest, they were obviously more impressed by the healthy appearance of the Bronx children than by either of the housing projects.

Today the three foreign and two American authorities will confer with members of the Municipal Housing Authority and the State Board of Housing at a luncheon at the Hotel Gramercy Park. Later this week they will meet with Secretary Ickes and executives of the P.W.A. Federal Housing Administration and Home Owners Loan Corporation at Washington.

Their itinerary will include major stops in Boston, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, New Orleans, Atlanta, Knoxville, Cincinnati and Philadelphia, as well as a return visit to New York.

America Enters World Body Of Working People

Comes Nearer To Geneva In Formal Acceptance Of Membership

The United States joined the International Labor Organization, says a Geneva dispatch by the Associated Press on August 21. The press association's account follows:

The labor office announced that Consul Prentiss Gilbert has delivered a letter accepting membership, effective yesterday.

The Labor Conference in June extended a unanimous invitation to the United States which stated that "acceptance involves those rights and obligations provided for in the constitution of the organization and shall not involve any obligations under the Covenant of the League of Nations."

Mr. Gilbert recalled this qualification and said that, exercising the authority conferred by Congress, President Roosevelt accepts the invitation "subject to the understanding expressed in the conference resolution."

Announcement of the action created a great deal of interest here. With Russia expected to join the League and the labor organization, there was speculation as to the German reaction to Washington's move since Germany left the labor organization at the same time she resigned from the League of Nations.

The Japanese have been particularly interested in the position of the United States, Japan having remained in the labor organization when quitting the League.

A delegate to the labor organization commented that if the United States had been represented at the last session, leaders are confident that the 44-hour week would have been adopted.

It is anticipated that the United States will have three seats in the governing body, one each for the Government, employers and workers.

To Further Understanding

WASHINGTON, Aug. 21—The International Labor Organization, of which the United States yesterday became a member, was established along with the League of Nations to further international understanding of the problems of the workingman throughout the world.

Affiliation with this international body, although it does not signify any participation in the League itself, is considered of extreme importance by those who believe that the nations of the world should work out their problems together.

Announcement that the United States had become a member of the ILO was made public simultaneously in Washington and Geneva, following the transmission to the International Labor Office of a letter of official notice by Mr. Prentiss B. Gilbert, American consul at Geneva.

Authorized By Congress

Authorization for American membership in the labor organization was given by Congress at its last session although in the rush of events many opponents of the League did not realize at the time that the United States had taken a long step toward the League itself.

At the same time they have been assured by government officials that the United States will not become involved in any way in European politics by this new step. Although the labor organization is closely connected with the League it does not carry any obligation to work with the League.

Nevertheless membership in the ILO will entail the presence of American officials at Geneva. There is talk that Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, may herself go to Geneva in the fall to attend the meeting of the governing body of the organization.

Air Regulations Seek Safety Of Plane Travellers

Federal Board Presents Rules To Operators In Talk At Washington

New regulations by which the Bureau of Air Commerce, under Eugene L. Vidal, hopes to promote the safety and efficiency of air navigation were explained to 100 representatives of airline operators, manufacturers and others connected with the production of mechanical aids to flying.

For eight hours the gathering heard Major R. W. Schroeder, chief of the airways inspection service, who presided at the conference, read the regulations which will probably become effective on Sept. 1, according to a Washington news to the New York Times on August 15.

The changes proposed virtually revised all of the old regulations. The major proposals were as follows:

The position of air dispatcher would be created, and he would be licensed by the bureau before qualifying for work on any scheduled airline.

All airways would be broken up into divisions and pilots would be licensed solely for that particular division. They would lose that license by remaining idle for sixty days.

An employment code would be enforced in the flying industry, pilots being limited to a maximum of 1,000 hours a year, and not over 100 hours in any one month.

Predicts Regular Blind Flying

Major Schroeder pictured airplanes of the future flying so high that oxygen tanks would be standard equipment on large planes. He told the officials that blind flying would soon be just as ordinary as it is now sensational.

He urged the airline officials to work out improved schemes for teaching pilots instrument flying, saying that "next year we will prescribe one course, a standard one you will all use."

Single-engined passenger planes will be prohibited from night flying and from flying over fog or clouds and dangerous terrain. Only multi-engined craft will be authorized to carry passengers on night flights, and all such planes must be equipped with two-way radio communication before Jan. 1, 1936.

The multi-engined craft must first demonstrate ability to maintain a flight level of 500 feet over "valley level" with one dead engine.

An "airway" was defined, for the first time, as constituting a path fifty miles wide and extending twenty-five miles beyond either terminal or division. Pilots will be confined to such airways and will be prohibited from deviating from them. Where a forced landing occurs away from a regular airways field, the pilot would be forbidden to take off again with the passengers.

Major Schroeder said that present air line schedules were "too fast."

Mr. Vidal told the operators that the bureau was receiving many complaints about delayed arrivals. He attributed such complaints to the enthusiasm of the operators, who advertised greater speed than their planes were capable of flying.

But few of the proposed changes went unchallenged by the representatives of the operating companies. Several proposals were offered to the gathering for a vote. The most controversial changes were left to Mr. Vidal to settle or to a committee which Major Schroeder selected.

Single-Engine Rule Modified

The operators sought to lift that limitation of night flying from single-engined planes. But the best they could obtain was a promise that where the scheduled flight began in daylight hours and but a short distance remained when darkness arrived the single-engined craft could proceed.

Mr. Vidal also agreed to allow such craft to fly when cloud banks and fog were more than 2,000 feet above the ground. The operators also won a point when the word "licensed" was struck from in front of the word "dispatchers," although they were warned that strict supervision would be exerted over the dispatchers employed.

Neither side was able to agree upon the time a pilot should be absent from his licensed and scheduled division without losing his Federal license, nor how often and long transport pilots should take blind-flying tests.

The operators are expected to oppose the 1,000-hour maximum for pilots, offering instead a provision for about 1,020 hours a year, or 110 hours a month.

Aeronautic Groups Represented

Amelia Earhart and Phoebe Omlie, two of the best-known women fliers, attended the meeting. Miss Earhart represented National Airways, Inc., and Miss Omlie the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. Among the other prominent aviation officials who registered were:

Hugh L. Smith, American Airways, who acted as spokesman for the operators; Reed M. Chambers, United States Aviation Underwriters; William A. Patterson, United Air Lines; Paul Collins, National Airways, Inc.; L. D. Seymour, American Air Lines; Leighton W. Rogers, Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce of America; Paul R. Braniff, Braniff Airways; D. F. Colyer, United Air Lines; Jack Frye, TWA, and Colonel L. H. Brittin, Hanford Air Lines.

New Cold Record

AMSTERDAM—A new low temperature record of 0.03 degrees above absolute zero has been achieved by two Dutch professors at the Kamerlingh Onnes laboratory at Leyden.

The scientists, Professor de Hass and Dr. Wiersma introduced 56 cubic centimeters of paramagnetic salt into a strong magnetic field at a temperature of 1.16 on the kelvin, or absolute scale. The temperature obtained by this method was 0.03 degrees above absolute zero, the lowest temperature conceivable.

A new instrument, capable of accurate measurements at very low temperatures, was used in the experiment.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Beginning and the End

The British mobilized on August 3rd, 1914, and on the night of the 7th, began to embark an Expeditionary Force to France. The trans-shipment is one of the greatest navigation feats in martial history and lasted 10 days.

On August 23rd, the British troops for the first time came to grips with the German armies of Von Kluck and Bülow. This first battle took place at Mons, Belgium and lasted 5 days, marking the beginning of Great Britain's part in the World War. By a stroke of poetic justice, Britains World War activities ended on the same spot. The British troops recaptured Mons on the morning of November 11, 1918, almost at the exact moment at which the Armistice was being signed.

The night will be spent at the hotel and the homeward trip will start at 8 a.m. Monday which is a holiday. The route will be by way of Tajima, Kinugawa and Oyama. The round trip will cover about 350 miles, the roads are reported to be in good condition and the scenery throughout the trip is said to be extremely beautiful. The charge per person will be ¥8.50 which will include hotel bill and tips. Those arriving earlier than the regular party will be charged accordingly. Those wishing to take part in the excursion should send in their replies by noon, Friday September 21.

South America Fears Results Of Chaco War

the relations of the two countries, and refers to the numerous offers by other powers of their good offices. The United States, Argentina and Uruguay offered their assistance directly the dispute became public.

To appease Paraguayan feeling the Government here on Aug. 8 gave orders to tighten up Bolivian frontier control to avoid the smuggling of Chilean labor to the Altiplane, and issued a statement to the effect that the recently passed legislation prohibiting Chileans to enlist in foreign armies would be strictly enforced. It added that there would be no leniency for offenders, who are liable to many penalties, including loss of pension and civic rights. Provincial authorities were ordered to forbid the contracting of Chilean labor for Bolivian mines.

Unofficially, there is much speculation regarding the transformation of Chile's diplomatic possition vis a vis Bolivia. A decade ago there were few Chileans who foresaw the time when this country would be described as "very friendly" with Bolivia, long regarded as an enemy, and not on speaking terms with Paraguay, an historic and longstanding friend.

Relations Are Improved

Yet it cannot be denied that Chile's relations with Bolivia have vastly improved of late, due doubtless to the new economic policy of winning markets on the Pacific seaboard to compensate for the loss of non-American foreign trade. Much Chilean mining capital is invested in the inland republic and remunerative services are rendered there in a variety of commercial ways.

But the Government and press insist that there has been no departure from neutrality. Paraguayan suspicions are described as the price Chile has to pay for geographical contiguity to Bolivia.

Apart from the diplomatic dispute there is considerable domestic speculation regarding the Bolivian mission conducted by Senor Benjamin Cohen for the Chilean Government. Senor Cohen, who is well known in Washington where he acted as Charge d'Affaires for considerable period, has been in La Paz for nearly a month, and no publication has been authorized in connection with his activities there. The Foreign Office here, however, admits that these are of a "confidential character."

One fact stands out crystal clear in the Santiago press. The Chileans are obsessed with their "more trade" complex and are determined to use diplomacy and every other legitimate means to push their commercial relations with Pacific neighbors who are ready to reciprocate.

Bolivia offers considerable scope to Chilean capitalists and exporters, while the recent fillip to tin has increased the freight business on the northern railroads that pass through Chilean territory. Trade with Paraguay is nonexistent.

Change In U.S. Policy Towards Haiti Important

Due To Change In Oversea Attitude And Public Opinion In Republic

The ending of the American occupation of Haiti a year before the treaty date is due partly to the general oversea policy of the United States and partly to strong public opinion in the Negro Republic, says the New York correspondent of the Times, London. Certain Government Departments which have been under American administration for the last 19 years are being handed over gradually to Haitian control. During the next few months the complete transfer will be made, with the important exception that the United States will keep control of the finances of the Republic until such time as outstanding loan obligations have been met.

Haiti has always consisted of a large mass of uneducated peasants, whose standard of life is of the lowest, and a small but progressive elite, whose culture dates back to the early Colonial links with France and is kept alive by continuous contact with the parent country. This section is sharply divided on political questions. It is the educated minority that has been responsible for countless revolutions that have devastated the country for a century and a quarter and have prevented a return to that prosperity which the island of San Domingue once enjoyed as the richest Colonial possession of France.

Mountain Fighters

It is a truism in the Republic that there has never been a peasant revolt in which the mass of the people have participated. Bands of peasants, called cacos, were formed in the mountain districts, and were forcibly enlisted under the banner of the latest aspirant to power. These cacos became professional fighters, changing from side to side according to the precedence of the claimant of the moment. They conducted a guerrilla warfare from their mountain strongholds exceedingly difficult to combat, but a decisive campaign by the American Marines eventually succeeded in wiping them out. Without this menace citizens of the Republic are looking forward to self-government with a measure of confidence.

When in 1804 the Haitians revolted against the cruel system of slavery and oppression imposed by the French, and were successful in overthrowing their rulers and thus taking away from France (occupied in Europe with other affairs) the richest colony in the world, they destroyed all roads and great plantations in order to prevent any return of the domination of the hated whites. Always valiant fighters, and not incapable of producing heroic leaders—as is shown by names like Toussaint l'Ouverture, Jean Jacques Dessalines, and King Henri Christophe, whose citadel, 2,600ft. above sea-level at La Ferriere, is still one of the wonders of the Western Hemisphere—San Domingue, as the entire island was then called, had no experience in the arts of government. It was inevitable that there should be a perpetual struggle for power between ambitious leaders, who knew no more effective methods of settling their differences than those of fire and sword.

Rival Republics

The struggle was complicated by perpetual disputes between the two sections of the island now known as Haiti and San Domingo. The contemporary ruler, sometimes King, sometimes President, would usually lead an expedition from the French-speaking to the Spanish-speaking portion of the island, hoping by military exploits to add to his sometimes dubious prestige. These expeditions almost invariably failed; until time and language eventually settled the differences. The two Republics are now entirely separate, and the recent settlement of long-outstanding border disputes should give finality to the division.

After over 100 years of experimental rule, sometimes peaceful, more often the reverse, matters came to a climax between 1908 and 1915, a space of seven years known as the Revolutionary Period. Within this period seven Presidents were elected and deposed. Four of them died violent deaths; the others were deprived of office by revolution. During these political upheavals the Republic engaged in remarkable financial operations, plunging the country into a state verging on bankruptcy, and prejudicing the financial interests of nationals of England, France, Germany, and the United States. The United States was compelled to intervene. Rear-Admiral Caperton landed a company of Marines, a force considerably supplemented shortly afterwards; and the control of the finances of the Republic passed into American hands. The Haitian army was disbanded, and a native gendarmerie, officered by Americans, was formed. This is gradually passing into the control of Haitian officers.

At present the country is peaceful. Under the Presidency of Stenio Vincent there is no political unrest, and there seems no reason to expect a change for the worse. On the whole it is conceded that the Americans have carried out their difficult task well. They have restored the financial stability of the country, though they have done little to develop its resources.

The monetary unit, the gourde, is by law exchangeable for United States dollars at the fixed rate of five gourdes to the dollar. In 1928 the Haitian Treasury had an accumulated surplus of 19,000,000 of gourdes. Since then there has been a deficit each year, due to reverberations from the general world depression. Haiti is almost entirely dependent upon her coffee crop. Coffee flourishes wild all over this mountainous country, and for the mere labor of picking and preparing it the peasant enjoys comparative prosperity when prices are high. When they are low he lives a life of extreme poverty and misery; in such a degree that he will often farm out his children as servants in return for their mere subsistence. The country badly needs an alternative to this single crop. Cotton, cacao, sugar-cane, sisal, logwood, and tobacco together combine to form about 25 per cent. of the total exports; the remaining 75 per cent. consists of coffee. It is claimed that the United States has neglected her opportunity—some say her obligation—to perform a great educational work in this neglected Republic.

On the other hand, it is admitted that some excellent public services have been performed. The Haitian Public Health Service has made great progress under the disinterested guidance of officers of the United States Navy. In the cities sanitation has greatly improved. The Garde d'Haiti, the gendarmerie force referred to above, stands as a tribute to the Occupation. Apart from this, Haiti, though at a standard of civilization far below that of the rest of the West Indies, is not without amenities. There is much commerce in her fine harbor, largely from the United States, but also from England, France, Holland, and Germany. She is 24 hours from Jamaica by sea, and an excellent air service connects her with Cuba, Porto Rico, San Domingo, Jamaica, and Florida.

But of her population of 2,500,000 it is estimated that over 90 per cent. are illiterate; they speak no recognized language, their native Creole being built on a foundation of corrupt French and Spanish, with an African influence. Her urban population consists of only 200,000. Ninety-five per cent. of her people are pure negro, with a sprinkling among the urban aristocracy of mulattoes. The country consists of a fan-shaped series of mountain ranges; the peasants in the various plains have communication with one another. The French roads have long since been destroyed; the Americans have opened up only one or two new ones.

The area of the country is 10,000 square miles, and it is potentially one of the richest countries of its size in the world. Now that the United States occupation, with its accompanying freedom from political turmoil, has nearly ceased, it remains to be seen what use the Black Republic will make of its new opportunity.

Byrd Ready For Death At Base, Poulter Report

message from Dr. Poulter on this subject says:

"My observations here and remarks that Admiral Byrd has made convince me that he has gone through things, particularly during the first three weeks of June and the past two weeks, that must have been beyond human ability to withstand. He was convinced he had reached the limit of his endurance. He was true to the polar code and played the man gallantly.

"As I think back I see things in his messages that we put there to keep us from realizing his condition, fearing that the trip in an attempt to reach him would risk the lives of others. Although he was up to meet us on our arrival, he should not have been. I see him showing marked improvement, but it will be some time before he fully recovers his strength.

Kept Complete Records

"A note was hung over his table dated June 15 referring to letter he had written to various people and to where the letters would be found, and, even thinking the tractor would arrive too late, he had written us a note which he had left on the table, but which he put out of his sight when we entered the shack. I marvel at how complete a set of scientific data he has obtained and how painstaking he has been with it. The thermometer broken was not the recording thermometer, so he has a continuous temperature record."

The messages Dr. Poulter referred to were Admiral Byrd's bi-weekly reports to Little America and those on the safety measures he dictated in reference to Dr. Poulter's proposed tractor trip to the advance base in connection with meteorological and meteor observations.

Dr. Poulter said that when Admiral Byrd had felt his strength going he had carried as much food as he could into the shack. Except when he made the rounds of his instruments he was in his sleeping bag. Most of the time he lived chiefly on powdered milk, canned corn, tomatoes, turnip tops and cereal and lemon powder, the latter for its anti-scorbutic value.

Occasionally he had seal meat or beef, which, having been on the deck where it was always cold, had frozen hard. The Admiral, Dr. Poulter said, took hours to eat enough to give him nourishment.

When the tractor trip was proposed, Dr. Poulter said, Admiral Byrd recognized what a help a beacon would be to the party in locating the base, and he made arrangements for such beacons during his stronger moments.

Carried Cans to Surface

He filled cans with gasoline from the drums lined up in the fuel tunnels and lined up the cans near the foot of the entrance shaft. He carried as many as he could to the surface, where he stored them in stands. He had a pole for raising these cans higher so that the light could be better seen. The blaze of two of these lights, Dr. Poulter reported, guided the relief party during the last eight miles.

Ages Spanned By Drinkwater For Corollary

Conditions In England And In Jerusalem Figure In New Production

Twenty years ago the people of England were saying "Things can never be the same again" without attempting to think of what things might be, writes Andrew E. Malone from London to the New York Herald Tribune. His story follows:

Twenty centuries ago, according to John Drinkwater, people were saying exactly the same thing and with the same lack of precision and provision in the words they used. The year 1933 in England was as disturbed in its social and political atmosphere as was the year 33 in Jerusalem, and it was probably the realization of the apparent similarity that set Mr. Drinkwater's mind working on the new play, "A Man's House," which was staged for the first time at the opening of the Sixth Drama Festival in the Malvern Theater.

In an explanatory note which he has contributed to the book of the Malvern Festival, Mr. Drinkwater makes this clear: "No man can live," he says, "in the world of today without being constantly aware of the revolutionary influences that are active on every hand. Sometimes they are crudely violent; sometimes hardly perceptible in their operation, but they are in one form or other within the common experience of everybody. I wanted to dramatize the disintegrating effects that doctrinal revolution may have upon the harmonies of this established family group." So he selected the time of Christ's entry into Jerusalem to point his parable of 1933.

Jerusalem in 1933

In Jerusalem of 33, as in England of 1933, a social and political barometer would have been very distinctly set at "change" or "unsettled," and, like Mathias and Esther in the play, the world is still undecided whether the revolution is over or whether it has just begun. The dramatist would seem to be in the same state of expectant perplexity.

What Mr. Drinkwater has done is a reconstruction, in contemporary language, of a prosperous and long-established commercial house in Jerusalem at the time of the Crucifixion. For six generations the House of Salathiel had been among the leading commercial families in Jerusalem. With his two daughters, Esther and Rachel; his son, Mathias, and his brother, Nathan, Salathiel had lived in luxurious contentment. The elder daughter, Esther, had been blind for a decade and had lived in quiet desperation with her needlework and her dreams, but Rachel was vivacious and questing. Brought up to carry on the family business and tradition, Mathias had imbibed his father's philosophy only too well and even as a young man had settled into the established grooves. Nathan was something of a poet, permitted by the generosity of his brother to "scribble if you must, and talk as you please to those with sense enough to take no notice."

Love of Rachel

When the play opens the family is disturbed and incensed by the love of Rachel for a young man named David, who had become a follower of "the Nazarene," who was to Salathiel and Mathias merely a disturber of the peace and a preacher of sedition. To point his parallel Mr. Drinkwater keeps strictly to that conception of Christ, and the play has nothing to say about His religious teaching. Toward anything that threatens their peace, Salathiel and Mathias are unyielding; so Rachel and David go to Bethany to be with Christ, in preparation for His rumored entry into Jerusalem on the morrow. They are followed by Nathan and the serving boy, Jacob, who goes to join two of his brothers among the Apostles.

"A Man's House" is definitely political, written with dignified austerity through which occasionally there breaks the passion of human emotions. It has not the dramatic power of Maeterlinck's "Mary Magdalene," nor the religious fervor of Benson's "The Upper Room," nor the intimate appeal of Lady Gregory's "The Tidings Brought by Brigid"; nor has it, despite the fact that its author is a fine poet, the magnificent language of George Moore's "The Passing of the Essenses."

The author was splendidly served by an unusually competent, although not very distinguished cast, of which the outstanding members were Miss Joyce Bland, who gave a really beautiful interpretation of the blind girl, Esther, and Stanley Lathbury, who made a delightful comedy sketch of the Jewish official Barnabas.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Tornado Freak

One of the strangest antics of a tornado ever recorded happened in Elgin, Illinois, July 1933, when a twister hit a house just north of the city and tore the end of the house completely away exposing the interior to full view yet not even disarranging the dishes that were piled on shelves against the wall that had vanished.

My drawing was made from a photo taken by B. M. Rose of 201 South Grove Avenue, Elgin, just after the tornado had passed.

Tomatoes Are Wetter Than Milk

Chemical analysis shows that tomatoes are composed of approximately 94.3 per cent water, but milk contains only 87 to 88 per cent water. Therefore a tomato is only about 5 per cent solid, but milk is about 12 per cent solid.

Mencken Outlines How U.S. Should Curb Criminals

Places Blame On Lax Courts For Present Deplorable Situation

"My remedy for crime involves but one change in the existing laws, and that is a small one. Otherwise it provides only the simple experiment of executing those laws as they stand. Let them be enforced for one year running, diligently and according to their letter, and crime will become so hazardous that only actual lunatics will engage in it.

"The blame for the current terror is always laid at the wrong door. When a conspicuous criminal is at large, the poor cops are denounced for not taking him at once. But in nearly every case they have already taken him, not once but half a dozen times. He is not loose because they have failed but because the whole machinery of justice above them has failed. With the grotesque system of justice which prevails, getting loose is twice as easy as staying in jail. The returns of the United States Bureau of Investigation, covering 596 American cities, show that in all cases of murder reported in 1933 arrests were made in 50.5 per cent, and that in all cases of manslaughter they were made in 30.4 per cent.

"Certainly there is no sign of neglect of duty here. The cops go out at the risk of their lives and drag the scoundrels in. In the year 1932, according to the Bureau of the Census, there were 11,000 homicides in the United States, and during the same year the cops arrested 9000 of the murderers. But of the 9000 only 130 went to the gallows or the chair. And how many, having got behind bars, stayed there? The Census Bureau shows that the normal prison population of the country is about 135,000, that in an average year about 75,000 new prisoners are dressed in, and about the same number are turned loose. How and why are they turned loose? A hundred or so depart in coffins, executed for their crimes. A thousand die from natural causes. Two thousand take French leave over the wall. Twenty-five thousand, or about one third, finish their sentence. All the rest, running to more than 40,000 in an average year, are paroled, pardoned, or otherwise released."

"Two things are responsible for this wholesale cheating of justice. The foremost is the chaotic state not of law, but of legal procedure. The law is everywhere sufficient to deal with every kind of serious crime. In 40 of the 48 states the punishment for deliberate murder is death. If these laws were enforced for a year at least 2000 murderers would go to the gallows instead of 130.

"What stands in the way of their execution is simply the incredible lack of conscience of so many lawyers and judges. As likely as not the chief lawyer for the defense is a professional jury fixer, with no more respect for the law than the prisoner in the dock. And almost certainly the chief lawyer for the prosecution is a political hack seeking publicity, hopeful of higher office, and putting on a show for the newspapers.

"In England a judge actually runs his court. If a shyster defending a criminal resorts to trickery he is hauled up at once, and if he persists he is as good as disbarred. And if a prosecuting officer, forgetting the solemnity of the inquiry before him, begins to strike attitudes and tear his hair, he is hauled up just as quickly, and thereafter he prosecutes no more. An English judge makes up his mind without delay, he sees that his orders are obeyed instantly, and it is seldom that his judgments are upset on appeal.

"In the United States a criminal trial is a tin-pot melodrama while it is going on, and before and after there are almost endless delays. It takes an average of at least a year to bring a well-heeled criminal to trial, and after he is convicted it takes another year, and maybe even two or three, to get him into jail. Back in 1931 a rich politician, banker, and rogue was put in the dock in North Carolina for a series of swindles, and by some accident was promptly convicted. But it was May, 1934, before he was actually behind the bars. During the same year of 1931 a rich crook of the same kidney was brought to trial in England. He was arraigned on July 20, convicted on July 31, and jailed on August 31, and in jail he remained until the end of his term. In America by the time a criminal comes to trial half the witnesses against him have disappeared, and before he gets into jail the rest are dying of old age. And once he is behind the bars the chances are two to one that he willl be out again before his term has expired.

"The blame for all this rests squarely upon the bench and bar of the country. Half the delays in justice among us are due to the failure of lawyers to show a reasonable professional conscience, and the other half are due to the failure of judges to bring them to book.

War In Europe Is Long Way Off, In Hearst's Opinion

low the war will be as great as the devastation of the war. Combined, they will mean annihilation and anarchy.

Sane Leaders See Danger

"This is not a Jeremiad. The facts are clear to any one who has ordinary foresight. I am sure the rulers of the nations of the world have better than ordinary vision. They know what the results of another war will be in wrack and revolution. Depend upon it, there will be no war for many years to come.

"The only possible causes of war would be the utter injustices of the Versailles treaty, but these will be rectified by the pressure of events and peaceful negotiations. The financial injustices of Versailles have corrected themselves. The territorial injustices will correct themselves and the racial injustices will correct themselves and their correction will insure peace.

"France has the most to gain by peace and the most to lose by war. She will be for peace. England will be for peace: her dominions would not follow her into another European war or at least, they would desert her after the war. Italy, next to France has most to gain by peace. Mussolini is too wise to follow the example of the Kaiser and run the risk of losing the great progress his nation has made.

"There must be and will be no war. The differences will be settled by peaceful plebiscite. The alternatives are peace or destruction. All the statesmen know it, all the peoples know it. There will be peace."

JAPAN COMPLETES PLANS FOR RED CROSS CONFERENCE

Delegates Will Begin Arriving During The Next Few Weeks; Dinner Is Given By Prince Tokugawa To Solicit Support Of The Press

With the giving of a dinner at the Peers' Club last week by Prince Tokugawa, President of the Japan Red Cross, plans for the holding of the Fifteenth International Red Cross Conference in Tokyo from October 20, were made public. The various delegations will commence to arrive during the next few weeks, and the forthcoming conference promises to be one of the most successful ever held.

The XVth International Red Cross Conference will be held at Tokyo beginning October 2.

The first of the fourteen preceding conferences took place in 1867 in Paris. Since then, an international Red Cross Conference has been held on the average once every five years. The intervals have varied: there was no conference between 1869 and 1884, nor between 1912 and 1921. On the other hand, the impulse given to the idea of international co-operation, in the years immediately following the Great War, led to a shortening of the interval between international Red Cross meetings. The Tenth Conference, held in 1921, was followed by the Eleventh only two years later, and by the Twelfth in 1925. Similarly, only two years intervened, between the Hague meeting of 1928 and the Brussels Conference of 1930.

Of the fourteen conferences already held, four have met in Geneva and nine others in different European capitals. Only once before, in Washington in 1912, has this world assembly of the Red Cross movement met outside Europe. The Fifteenth International Red Cross Conference will consequently be only the second in 70 years held on non-European soil, and the first to assemble in an Asiatic country.

International Red Cross Conferences are unique in character because of the fact that they bring together on a footing of complete equality the representatives of national Red Cross Societies and the delegates of the Governments which have signed or adhered to the Geneva Convention. There are, of course, many international movements which hold international conferences—some of them almost as completely international as those of the Red Cross; on many occasions the Governments of the world (especially during the past fifteen years) have come together in conference to examine problems of world-wide interest: but the Red Cross is alone among world movements in having behind it nearly three-quarters of a century of Government cooperation in tse international as well as in the national field.

The original reason for Government paricipation in international Red Cross conference was, of course, that the activity of national Red Cross Societies, in the pursuance of their original task of providing help and comfort to sick and wounded soldiers in time of war, is auxiliary to the work of Governments in this field. It was consequently recognized from the beginning by the leaders of the Red Cross movement that Governments should have their word to say in the assembly which formulates Red Cross policies internationally; and the Governments have throughout the history of the movement shown themselves keenly alive to the advantages of this course. International Red Cross conferences never have a strictly Governmental character. The Chair is never occupied by a Government representative—always by a leading Red Cross figure. The delegates are never the guests of the Government, but always of the national Red Cross Society of the country in which they meet, or of the International Committee when they have met in Geneva. Nevertheless, when a resolution is put to the vote, each Government delegation possesses the same voting power as a Red Cross delegation.

It is only in the "Board of Delegates", which meets as an integral part of the conference and fixes the final agenda and the order of business, that the representatives of the Red Cross societies meet by themselves without the Government's participation. The "Board of Delegates" comprises only representtives of the Red cross delegations participating in the conference. Its composition is therefore but little different from that of the Board of Governors of the League of Red Cross Societies, which also holds its meeting at the same time and place as the International Conference. This arrangement dates from the Thirteenth International Conference in 1928, when the Statutes of the International Red Cross were adopted, and the League agreed to substitute the International Red Cross Conference for the League General Council meetings which had previously been organized separately.

The agenda and procedure of International Red Cross Conferences have been somewhat substantially modified by the arrangements concluded in 1928. Previous to that date the International Conference had dealt only occasionally with questions lying outside the wartime preoccupations of the Red Cross. Now, more than half the questions tabled for discussion relate to the activities of Red Cross Societies in peacetime.

Red Cross Leaders Who Will Attend Parley Here

Room has had to be found on the agenda for the General Report of the League of Red Cross Societies, as well as for the reports of the International Committee and those of national Societies. A report is also made to each Conference by the Standing Commission of the International Red Cross, which was constituted in 1928 to represent the Conference in the intervals between meetings.

Under the arrangement now in force the first body to convene in connexion with an International Red Cross Conference is the Executive Committee of the League. The Board of Governor of the League then holds its opening session and arranges its program so as not to clash with the plans for the Conference. The "Board of Delegates" the assembles, prepares nominations for the Chairman, Vice-Chairmen and Secretaries of the Conference, and fixes the lagenda and order of business. The way is then clear for the formal opening session.

At this session the officers are elected. It has become customary to designate, in addition to the officers above-mentioned, a Secretary General of the Conference, (who two Assistant Secretaries-General, one representing the International Committee and the other member of the Secretariat of the League.

The first business is generally the presentation of the General Reports. Under the terms of recommendation adopted in Brussels, it is proposed that at Tokyo, and at future Conferences, the General Reports of the National Societies shall not be read individually, but shall be entrusted to a rapporteur, who will extract the novel and noteworthy features from each report and give a verbal summary of them to the assembled delegates.

After the Reports of the International Committee, the League and the Standing Commission have been presented, the Conference breaks up into commissions, each of which is entrusted with the consideration of one or more of the items on the agenda The commissions report back to the Conference in plenary session and present draft resolutions, which are adopted with such amendments as the Conference may think fit. The only business then remaining is the nomination of the members of the Standing Commission, who hold office until the next Conference assembles, and the fixing of the date and place of the next meeting.

After the Conference rises a further meeting of the "Board of Delegates" may be held, and the Board of Governors regularly holds a final session, to consider any questions which may be referred to either of them for action.

The agenda of the Tokyo Conference cover an unusually wide field. They comprise 25 items, of which seven relate to the formal business of which an outline has been given above, three to juridical questions connected with the Geneva Convention, and two to the work of the Red Cross in wartime. The remaining twelve questions cover the whole field of peacetime Red Cross activity, with special emphasis on the relationship of the disaster relief work of Red Cross Societies and of the International Red Cross bodies to the activities of the International Relief Union. It is intended that at Tokyo the outstanding importance of the nursing work of the Red Cross, and of the Junior Red Cross movement shall be stressed by assigning these questions to special commissions which, it is hoped, will be largely composed of technical experts.

The efforts which are being made by Red Cross leaders in all countries to adapt Red Cross activities to modern conditions are clearly apparent from the agenda of the Conference. Among the questions tabled for discussion we find "Red Cross participation in welfare work and unemployment relief," "First Aid of Highways," and "Air Ambulances." Nor have the possibilities of the Red Cross as a factor in improving international relationships been forgotten.

It is perhaps because international relationships at the opening of the year 1934 stand so evidently in need of improvement that the Tokyo meeting acquires such outstanding importance. Many of those who, during the past fifteen years, have been foremost in promoting international co-operation, have been discouraged by the apparent reaction which has taken place during the past few months in the direction of thinking in terms of national units rather than in terms of world unity.

For those whose efforts have lain in the Red Cross field it is extremely gratifying to find that in this field co-operation is as keen as ever, and international feeling a growing, not a diminishing factor. The fact is, no doubt, that in Red Cross matters there arise none of the obstacles to international co-operation which from time to time loom so large when economic or political questions are at stake, or when racial or religious factors intervene. Red Cross, from the beginning, has resolutely declined to submit to any of these influences which may make for division between peoples. The Red Cross progame, which at first looked no further than the needs of sick and wounded soldiers in wartime, has now been vastly extended—to a point at which it may fairly claim that it contributes towards the solution of almost all problems of human suffering; and with this extension of program has gone geographical extension so vast that the Red Cross emblem is recognized and its meaning generally known in almost every civilized country in the world. But this vast development has left the fundamental Red Cross principle of neutrality unimpaired. Because of the unwavering fidelity of the Red Cross to this principle—because the Red Cross idea is an ideal of service, and the motivating force behind it the universal human impulse to relieve suffering, world cooperation in the Red Cross field is not only a practical possibility but a practical fact today. Of that co-operation, and of the spirit of understanding which makes it possible, the Tokyo Conference will be a living illustration.

Dizzy Dean Wins 24th Victory For Cards This Year

Roy Hansen Of Phillies Checks Cincinnati Reds To 5 Scattered Hits

Renzo

NEW YORK, Sept. 5—"Dizzy" Dean, star hurler of the St. Louis Cardinals, today hung up his 24th victory this season when the Cardinals took the measure of the Brooklyn Dodgers. Another fine pitching performance was turned in today by Roy Hansen of the Philadelphia Phillies, who held the Cincinnati Reds to no runs and five scattered hits.

The leaders in both loops were victorious today, the New York Giants defeating the Chicago Cubs, while the Detroit Tigers defeated the Philadelphia Mackmen. The New York Yanks and the Chicago White Sox were idle.

Moore Hits Homer

The Giants beat the Cubs by the score of 5 to 1. More banging out a homer for the winners in an errorless game in which the losers were outhit by 8 to 6.

The tussle at Brooklyn between the Cardinals and the Dodgers ended 3 to 1 in favor of the Cards, Collins and Delancey scoring home runs. The Cardinals, who made one miscue, outhit their opponents by 10 to 3. "Dizzy" Dean hurling great baseball.

Despite a homer by Hogan, the Boston went down to defeat at the hands of the Pittsburgh Pirates who won by 8 to 2. The losers made two costly errors and were outhit by 11 to 8.

With Roy Hansen hurling airtight baseball, the Phillies defeated the Cincinnati Reds 1 to 0.

In the American League, the Detroit Tigers stretched their lead over the idle Yankees by defeating the Philadelphia Athletics by the count of 4 to 2 in an errorless tussle despite the fact that the Macks pounded out 11 hits to their seven.

Another close game was witnessed at St. Louis where the Browns took the measure of the Washington Senators by the score of 6 to 4. The Solons scored 11 hits against 10 for their opponents but made two costly errors.

Indians Beat Red Sox

In the only other tussle staged in the junior circuit, the Cleveland Indians swamped the Boston Red Sox, the score being 11 to 2. Each side made one miscue. The Indians collected a total of 14 hits one of which was a circuit clout by Trosky, while the Red Sox made only six bingles.

Bob Pearce Retains His Sculling Title

Rengo

TORONTO, Sept. 5—Bob Pearce, Cnadian holder of the world's sculling championship, returned his crown today by defeating Miller, of America, in the final. Peace won by 15 lengths over a three-mile course on Lake Ontario.

In the eliminating events on August 24, Miller defeated Bert Barry, former English holder of the title, by three-quarters of a length, taking 21 minutes, 24 1-5 seconds for the three-mile course, while Pearce defeated Eric Phelps, son of the King's barge master, by 20 lengths in 19 minutes, 38 1-2 seconds.

Pearce won the title last year from Ted Phelps.

Bandits Take Cash In Spectacular Hold-Up

taken from the wheels and it was examined for fingerprints.

The abandoned sedan was found to have carried the license plates of another stolen car, but actually to have been the property of Mrs. Anna Friedman of 217 Beverly Road, Brooklyn, from whom it was stolen on June 1. The car was taken to Manhattan police headquarters, where it was carefully examined for fingerprints and other evidence.

The twenty-two witnesses, whose names were carefully shielded by the police, and who said they had been told not to talk to the press, were taken to headquarters, where they examined rogues gallery photographs, and were questioned by Police Commissioner O'Ryan and others. The witnesses, in addition to the crew of the armored truck, and McGee, included two schoolgirls, both 11 or 12 years old, a woman about 45 years old, four Negroes and twelve other men.

The seizure of $427,0000 in cash took rank as one of the most spectacular raids in the annals of American crime and one that probably involved the largest amount of acutal cash in recent crime history in the United States.

The New York police believed that records would show that never had a larger amount of cash been seized by robbers in this country. There have been numerous mail robberies in which the loot has gone to a much higher figure, but most of the booty was in bonds.

The most daring crime of that kind committed in New York City was that led by Gerald Chapman, who led a group that held up a mail truck on Leonard Street and got about $2,400,000 in bonds. Chapman was afterward hanged for murder in Connecticut. Much of the loot in the Leonard Street crime was never recovered.

$2,000,000 Robbery in Chicago

In the neighborhood of Chicago there have been several big mail robberies, such as the Rondout robbery in 1924, when $2,000,000 in bonds was stolen; the Evergreen Park (Ill.) robbery in 1926, when $133,000 in cash was seized, and the Chicago Loop mail robbery in 1932, when $500,000 in negotiable securities was obtained by a daring band of thieves. In 1930 gangsters with machine guns invaded a Lincoln (Neb.) bank and stole $3,000,000, but most of this was in securities and much of the loot was recovered later.

In the last few years Brooklyn itself has seen some hold-ups by armed bands somewhat similar to the present crime. In 1924 the Diamond brothers—Morris and Joseph—led a hold-up in which two bank guards for the West End Bank were slain as they stepped from a subway station in Brooklyn and robbed $47,000. The two Diamonds and John Farina were put to death in Sing Sing.

In July of 1932 a man walked brazenly into the Chemical Bank and Trust Company at 165 Broadway in lower New York and asked "for the money for the United States Trucking Corporation," which was making collections. An official, unquestioning, handed him the money and the thief walked off with the loot. Former employes of the trucking company were suspected.

Early in May of this year five thugs with pistols raided the Prudential Savings Bank branch in the Flatlands district of Brooklyn and, cowing ten men and women, escaped with $23,084. The car used by the robbers was later found.

Penns Grove Bank Robbed

On Feb. 2 of this year four men held up two messengers of the Penns Grove (N. J.) National Bank and Trust Company just as they stopped their car in front of the bank. A total of $130,000 in cash was seized. Two men were sentenced to long terms for that crime a few weeks later. They were John Fodale and Carol Johnson.

Richard Reese Whittemore headed a band which committed some spectacular crimes in and around New York. Whittemore was eventually put to death in Maryland for murder while trying to escape from prison. While there he hit Albert S. Goudvis, a jeweler, on the head at Fifth Avenue and Forty-eighth Street and the band escaped with $150,000 in gems.

On June 8, 1933, thugs disguised as policemen invaded the Corn Exchange Bank Trust Company branch in 110th Street, near broadway and escaped with $23,835. Arrests followed after some months had passed.

In the Prudential Savings Bank hold-up in Brooklyn it was believed that a blonde woman cruised up and down in front of the bank before the raid was made. The thieves in that instance apparently mingled with crowds, after parking their car on a quiet street a short distance from where a circus was playing.

Erosion Found Chief Problem Of Agriculture

Bennett Says No Other Nation Has Used Farm Lands So Wastefully

Holding that no nation has used its agricultural lands so wastefully as the United States, H. H. Bennett, director of the soil erosion service, back in Washington, D. C., from a survey of the drought area, served warning today of future calamity unless permanent corrective steps are taken, says the New York Herald Tribune.

Director Bennett, who is in charge of the Administration's soil erosion program, for which $10,000,000 has been allotted as the first installment, said recently:

"While we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars for fertilizer, soil-improving crops, plant breeding and agricultural machinery, we have done little to conserve the soil itself.

Billion Waste Charged

"Fully 35,000,000 acres of formerly cultivated land, worth $1,750,000,000, has been ruined by unrestrained erosion, and the products of wastage have clogged stream channels and filled costly reservoirs."

In addition, 125,000,000 acres have been stripped of the more productive top soil, with a consequent reduction of value of more than $3,000,000,000, he said.

"On these soil-stripped, impoverished areas tens of thousands of farmers are battling for existence," he went on. "Land stripped of the fecund surface covering is not soil; the exposed subsoil is simply the material of which soil is made through long periods of natural processes.

"Over twelve of our principal soil types, occurring chiefly in the Mississippi Valley, actually measurements have shown that under prevailing methods of usage sixty-five times as much soil and five times as much rain water are being lost every year as compared with the loses under natural conditions of vegetation and ground structure."

Although the soil erosion service already has under way twenty-five projects where most modern protective measures are being developed Director Bennett warned:

"If this is to be a permanently prosperous country, we must from now on battle for the conservation of our remaining acres of good farm land, and we may as well recognize now that this fight will call for readjustment of fields and the widespread use of practical soil-protective farm measures."

Future Needs Stressed

"In some degree the magnitude of the present widespread drought is now understood by the public, but the nation does not understand the full significance of this sun-forged holocaust, or the omninous import of the situation. Numerous remedies have been proposed, mostly measures that look to immediate relief. Such relief will be necessary as a matter of course, but there is the danger that . . . the imperative needs of the future may be overlooked. . . .

"The effects of the drought, however, have been made more disastrous than could have been possible by any other process except that characterizing our American methods of land misuse. Over vast areas the fine stands of nutritious bunch-grass that formerly covered so much of the Northwestern grazing states have largely or completely disappeared, due to unwise methods or range use Worthless weeds, short-lived annuals sagebrush and bare ground have taken the place of the native forage plants over numerous mistreated areas.

"Of course, we must continue to cultivate in the neighborhood of 300,000,000 acres. No one is proposing to discontinue such cultivation. We shall never be able to stop erosion completely or to cause all the rainfall to be absorbed by the ground but we can, if we will, go far in the direction of reducing these losses and at the same time produce enough and more for all our needs. Some vulnerable areas and inherently poor land should be put to other uses, but a vast amount of the necessary readjustments in land use can be carried out co-operatively with farmers and ranchers in such a way as not to disturb very greatly the numbers now living on the land."

The Everlasting Fire

The fire that has been burning continuously for the last 500 years is maintained with peat from the Yorkshire Moore in the Checkers Inn of Osmotherly, England. It is a relic of the old coaching days when, according to tradition, the fire was never permitted to go out. Excellent griddle cakes are still cooked over the Everlasting Fire.

Hirota Hopes Manchu Lesson Will Aid China

whatever from any quarter whatever if that thing gives promise of genuine benefit to the Chinese people, and, consequently, to every people. I hope our neighbors in the world will appreciate Japan's unexceptionable motives in the matter, our intense sympathy for the Chinese in their great difficulties, our complete innocence of any wish in this connection except a wish for China's peace and progress. And I hope the nations, in all their transactions with China, will ask themselves this question:

"'Taking the broad and the long view, are we indeed helping China, and thus helping our own people and the world, or are we rather intensifying and prolonging a common disaster?'"

"Do you feel that the treaty peace-structure in the Pacific needs revision to conform to present realites?"

Anti-Foreignism

"I am aware of no call for revision of this structure at present. If circumstances should develop appearing to make such revision desirable, Japan would approach the matter in a spirit of friendly international cooperation. I cannot emphasize too strongly our faith in such cooperation, touching questions of whatever sort, so long as they are susceptible of international treatment. I am doing my best to broaden in every way the general Japanese feeling and outlook concerning our foreign relations.

"Anti-foreignism is particularly abhorrent to me. It is both unwise and undignified in any nation. I urge all Japanese, whether in public or in private life, to maintain the most respectful and courteous intercourse with foreigners who visit our country and to support the Government in its consistent effort to demonstrate its belief in the universal bortherhood of humanity. Yet I never cease to point out to my countrymen the necessity of Japanese constancy in the pursuit of the peace stabilizing mission of our Empire in the Far East."

Right of Self-defense

"You believe in the sanctity of ties?"

"Implicitly, completely. We do not dream of trespassing upon other nations' rights and interest under existing treaties. I repeat, we violated no treaty or treaties in our operations in Manchuria. We acted there, as we shall act everywhere, in entire consonance with our self-defensive traditions. And everyone will remember that the Briand-Kellogg Pact impairs no nation's right to defend itself. As Mr. Kellogg stated categorically at the time of the making of the famous Pact no treaty can take away from a nation the right of self-defense, a thing inherent and indefeasible alike in the nation and in the individual."

"You prefer to deal with the nations separately relative to treaty rights,"

"Yes. We are always ready to exchange views with each individual Power respecting treaty rights and interests. Our experience at Geneva in relations to the Manchurian question convinces us of the futility of such negotiations. We do not wish to reproduce that situation."

"Will you kindly explain Japan's naval standpoint?"

Mr. Hirota addressed himself to this question with peculiar thoughtfulness and gravity.

"That is a matter which impinges seriously upon Japanese politics. It was partly responsible, as you know, for the assassination of two Premiers, and of many eminent business men. The purpose of our Government is to handle the problem with a view to Japanese security, but without menace to other Powers. We will not deviate from this line;"

"Do you judge the ratio principle ill-advised?"

"In the long history of naval power, the ratio principle has been on trial for little more than a decade. It may not be the best principle. Diligent study may evolve a better. We devote our minds to this problem, as to other international problems, in the spirit of good-will realizing the necessity under which each Goverment labors to make its defenses such as to relieve the national mind of anxiety as to the nation's safety. No nation can go about its work properly if haunted by the fear of triumphant aggression. Give the nations a settled sense of security, and we shall have a firm foundation of peace."

"Is it conceivable to you that America would be capable of unprovoked aggression against Japan or any other nation?"

"No," said Mr. Hirota, bursting into laughter. "No."

"Do the Japanese people think so?"

"No. Not at all."

"You deem Japanese-American peace impregnable?"

"I do."

"Can anyone define an aggressor?"

"Impossible."

"Do you expect another world War."

"No. I expect peace. War is not like natural calamities, earthquakes, fires, hurricanes, floods. These cannot be prevented. Human volition is impotent in the face of their onsets. But human volition can conquer war. Governments and peoples make war. What governments and peoples can do, they can refrain from doing."

"Do you think the West is prone to magnify Japanese proportions in the Far East?"

"Occidental," replied Mr. Hirota, an expression of lively amusement on his face, "gazing westward across the Pacific, see Japan as a burning candle casting a gigantic shadow upon a wall, a background, which is China. It is a gigantic shadow, but a shadow. If these Occidentals will go to China, and, standing in the midst of that vast territory and populations, gaze eastward, they will see the Japanese candle—the Candle of the Gigantic Shadow—as in reality very small."

The last question was this:

"Do you believe in democracy?"

"I do. The Imperial House reigns supreme in Japan, but it reigns in perfect harmony with the welfare of the people. This is quite characteristic of Japan, unique and peculiar. Government is neither legitimate nor safe except when it rests upon service to the people and thereby commands their devotion. That government, in other words, is democratic which seeks the nation's good and executes its will."

Vaccine As Sure Curb For Paralysis Doubted

was so infrequent that healthy carriers were suspected but not proved.

"The isolation of the virus in 1909 supported the contact theory, but due to technical difficulties, the healthy carriage could not be verified. Nor could the actual extent of dissemination. The more workable immunity test has shown that the spread of the virus is world-wide, extensive in the population, and takes place more or less uniformly whereas the paralytic disease is regional, limited and selective.

"Whom does the virus single out for paralysis? The recent heredity studies of the Harvard commission indicate that it selects only the few and it is those who stand in need of protection. When further studies enable us to pick out these few it may then be possible to vaccinate them by a method too hazardous for general application. Or there may be a way of correcting their susceptibility as we now correct the tendency to such disease as rickets by making sure that all children get a sufficiency of some needed element.

"There is a difference between the vaccinations we are used to and the idea of vaccination for infantile paralysis. We all take as a matter of course the legalized vaccination against smallpox because we are all susceptible to smallpox. But in poliomyelitis the vast majority are not susceptible and do not need a vaccine.

"To vaccinate everybody when less than one in a thousand needs to be protected would not seem to be justifiable in the absence of guarantees of safety. There is as yet no guaranty. Research has not proceeded far enough to be able to assure it to the public. No vaccine has yet been developed which deserved the confidence given to smallpox vaccine. The fact that the vaccine has been self-injected into adult humans is no indisputable proof. Most adults are immune, and it is possible to test this immunity beforehand. It does not follow that the vaccine would be equally safe for a non-immune child.

"Wickman, whose work in poliomyelitis was a masterpiece, found that the virus spread from person to person largely through healthy carriers. That was in the early 1900s. Landsteiner and Popper in 1909 first transmitted the disease to monkeys, and by the transmission isolated the virus for the experimental study of the disease.

"Flexner and his co-workers, Lewis and Amos, carried on by establishing the role of the upper respiratory tract in the transmission of the disease. Caverly, Frost, Wernstedt and many others have made imporant contributions to the study of the disease. Finally, the Harvard commission has established the selectivity of the disease.

"Interest in poliomyelitis has become national in these last few years. More men are working in research than ever before and from their experiments there is always hope that the final solution may come. But the study has been a long one. Once the wayfarer could sometimes pick up a nugget, but now only consistent mining yields results. No prize offered as a reward for discovery of the answer within a specified time could guarantee it. Science does not work that way; it is slow."

German Mercantile Spirit Unbroken, Says Schacht

cause of outstanding contracts, but partly because the special accounts kept at the Reichsbank, under the so-called "Swedish clause" agreements, for foreign banks of issue made these measures illusory. These special accounts had been their constant anxiety. Large balances were accumulated and swelled, which had an unfavorable influence on the mark. Further, they enabled the importer of non-controlled goods to import goods outside the foreign exchange allotment granted him. The provision recently inserted in these agreements, that the goods must originate from or have been processed in the country concerned, had been often evaded; the German importer had obtained goods for which his foreign exchange quota did not suffice through countries with special accounts. After they had introduced the day-to-day repartitioning of foreign exchange in June, the payment difficulties connected with this system led to a progressive increase of payments to the special accounts. In-payments rose from 68,000,000 marks in March to 130,000,000 marks in June; that is, more than one-third of German imports were paid for through these accounts. The payments to these special accounts, which were not covered by the foreign exchange repartitioning, had not only cut right across their unavoidable policy of import restriction, but had injurious results in that raw materials, which under the raw materials control could not have been imported, were brought in in a half or quarter finished state by means of these accounts. The intended proportion of exports to imports was thus altered to Germany's disadvantage.

"Forced Into Autarchy".

What was the situation? asked Dr. Schacht. The world strove to ward off Germany's exports. Thus Germany was made incapable not only of paying her old debts but of buying in the world's markets; she was being forced into autarchy.

Would Germany and the world get over this? Cooperation was needed on both sides. He hoped internal economic reason would prevail over certain political tendencies. They did not reproach others who did not share their views. They would not have other views forced on them.

They were told that they should deflate or devaluate. Experience had shown that deflation could only decrease the world trade. They were not ready to join in the currency depreciation race. It would mean the increase of their foreign losses burden. Further, German exporters needed foreign raw materials, which devaluation would make dearer.

Germany must take all measures to overcome her difficulties. The present system of repartitioning foreign exchange would not be maintained. It now must give way to a more durable arrangement. The same applied to the system of exchange agreements. Under the foreign exchange repartitioning system, neither the German buyer nor the foreign seller were sure that the goods would be paid for when due. The increasing volume of unpaid commercial debts had caused the customary import against three months' credit to give way to a cash-import system which must lead to a shrinkage of trade.

The ruling merchantile principle was to make no engagements which could not be met. Only the importer who held the corresponding foreign exchange authorization could hereafter count on obtaining the foreign exchange necessary to make payment. Imports made without such an authorization would be at the risk of the individual. They were working out the method of bringing their imports into line with their capacity to pay, and this would soon be made known. He warned all thoughtless importers now not to make engagements above the limit of the possible foreign payment. It was grotesque that foreign Governments should take official diplomatic steps about the payment of a few overdue commercial debts.

Dr. Schacht claimed for German merchants that confidence which, he said, they had always enjoyed. They wished to accept no credit that was not willingly and freely given. He would like to deny all reports attributing to them the intention to open credit negotiations abroad.

The new procedure would lead to a substantial restriction of their imports, for they could only grant foreign exchange authorizations to the measure of the available foreign exchange. The step was inevitable, for nobody could be expected to deliver goods which would not be paid for when due. The new method would deprive the outer world of all grounds for reproach against Germany. The rights of other States under existing agreements would not be infringed; in so far as such agreements were irreconcilable with the measures which had been forced on them they must be adjusted to the new situation by negotiation or denounced.

He was thinking of the exchange agreements, the disadvantages of which he had already explained. As to the clearing agreements with the east and south-east European States, these had not led to the same abuses. The clearing agreements with France and Switzerland had hardly begun to work.

How could they maintain the home trade revival in view of the impending restriction of imports? They would promote the production of home raw materials with all conceivable means. It was all one whether they supported the unemployed with public funds or put them to work producing home raw materials. They would leave nothing undone to promote their exports, but would not practise dumping methods.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Father of Three Centuries

Pierre Defournel, of Barjac Vivarais, was the father of three children each born in a different century. The first boy was born in 1699, the second son was born in 1738, and the third was born in 1801. Each child was a boy, and each born of a different wife. Defournel married his third wife when he was 120 years old and she was only 19. He died in 1809 at the ripe old age of 129.

Athens' Mad Millionaire Gives Fortune To Italy

The "mad millionaire of Athens," "Stingy Athansassoulis," "the man with the elastic nose," has died, leaving behind a characteristic slap at his relatives, his native land and posterity in general by deeding his many apartment houses to the Kingdom of Italy, says an Athens dispatch to the New York Times.

Athanassoulis once shot a financial enemy to death in the court room where their lawsuit was being tried. An insanity plea saved him from prosecution. Under the dictatorship of General Pangalos he charged his own brother with being a traitor to the State and toasted his arrest.

Athanassoulis was tagged with his second name after Viennese specialists made him an artificial nose, the only time when he was known ungrudgingly to have spent a large sum.

He lived with only a dog for a companion in a single room of one of his apartment houses which was otherwise empty. A table, a chair and a bed without bedclothing comprised his furniture. He resented applications for space in his apartment houses, preferring them empty because he was obliged to share their earnings with his sisters.

At death he promised he would revenge the malice of Greece by making Premier Mussolini his sole heir. When his family heard his will in favor of Italy they declared it had been made "in a moment of light-headedness."

All Nations Sign Paris Pact Or Signify Intent

obligations to settle its disputes with other nations by peaceful means ought to count upon the United States as a friendly neutral. Mr. Coolidge undertook to proclaim such a doctrine, provided that an American constitutional way could be found to make it binding upon his people. Then and later he sought earnestly to discover what he called "a constitutional way out."

Coolidge's Search

On Dec. 28, 1927, Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, as United States Secretary of State, launched his first proposals for a multilateral treaty to renounce war. As soon as I had read them I took it upon myself to assure sundry influential British statesmen that these suggestions pointed, in reality, to the "constitutional way out" which President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg were seeking.

In reply I was told that I was putting upon the Kellogg proposals an entirely unwarranted construction. Yet in June, 1928, more than two months before the Kellogg Pact was signed, a well-known member of the Republican Party gave me in London a personal message—which he himself did not understand—from President Coolidge. It ran: "Tell Steed I think this is the constitutional way out."

In the House of Commons last month Mr. Stanley Baldwin said, with reference to the proposed increase of the British Air Force and to the menacing European outlook, that "before we are through, we may find that some system of collective security will be the only solution." He was certainly right, but the real question is whether a system of collective security will be achieved before or after another devastating war.

I think such a system could be set up overnight. The one thing needful is fully to understand that the renunciation of war no matter whether war be termed "a crime" or be treated only as an international misdemeanor—entails the renunciation of neutrality toward any war maker, and that countries which renounce war without renouncing neutrality invalidate their own renunciation of war.

Renouncing Neutrality

The price of understanding, and of acting upon these principles may seem heavy. Heavy or light it is incomparably less than the price which war would exact from belligerents and non-belligerents alike. The renunciation of neutrality carries with it the corollary that, in a world which has renounced war, the only lawful function of armaments is a police function.

The renunciation of neutrality does not necessarily imply that every renouncer of war must intervene actively in any and every dispute wherever it may occur; but it does imply that the financial and economic resources of every non-neutral country shall exercise a police function by withholding aid and comfort from a war maker.

The actual organization of police work could best be the object of regional security pacts, such as are mentioned in Article 21 of the League Covenant, which refers expressly to the Monroe Doctrine. These regional arrangements acquire, however, another authority and moral quality if they are local expressions of a universal police principle instead of appearing to be alliances directed against some potential disturber of local peace.

The Kellogg Pact alone opens a way of approach to a universal league of security against war based on the principle of non-neutrality and the acceptance of a police function for all the resources of states that have renounced war.

By itself the League may be powerless to attain its original object. Flanked and supported by the Kellogg Pact definitely interpreted in the sense I have suggested, it might still save mankind from untold woe.

Trade Upswing In Many Nations Shown By Survey

Foreign Policy Association And Reserve Board Report Gradual Expansion

Improvement in the world economic situation was reported from two widely different sources, and business in many countries was pictured as gradually expanding, reports a Washington dispach to the Times, New York. Its account follows:

"Little doubt can remain regarding the existence of a world economic upswing of significant proportions," a report by the Foreign Policy Association said. The Federal Reserve Board, in its monthly bulletin, declared that "the decline in commercial bank loans which accompanied the development of the world depression appears to have been checked in some of the principal foreign countries."

Gains have been by no means evenly distributed, however, the Foreign Policy report, written by Maxwell S. Stewart, stated, and certain features of the upturn appear to be "basically unsound."

Improved conditions were reported in Great Britain, France, Japan, Australia and Germany, among the large nations, and "a certain consistency in the pattern of recovery that suggests the operation of similar forces" was seen.

"Currency Depreciation An Aid"

"It is significant," said the Foreign Policy Association, "that recovery has been most pronounced in the nations which have allowed their currencies to depreciate sufficiently to maintain a stable price level. It is evident that, in the case of certain raw materials, restriction of production has proved temporarily advantageous in raising prices and the purchasing power of producers.

"With a tightening of the restrictions on international trade, a certain amount of new construction has been necessary to furnish the domestic market in various countries with goods formerly purchased abroad. This factor, together with the need for replacements which had been neglected in the early years of the depression, resulted in special activity on the part of the capital equipment industries.

"There have been expenditures for public works, which in most cases have only become effective within recent months. While this has been partially offset in many countries by a curtailment of normal government expenditures, it has served to take up a portion of the slack which has resulted from a cessation of normal building activities."

Gains Mostly Domestic

Pointing out that revival, except in Australia and Japan, has been "almost wholly domestic in character," the report says:

"It is evident that little progress has been made toward overcoming the fundamental obstacles to a revival of world trade—such as the paralysis of international finance, exchange instability or elimination of trade barriers—without which recovery must be confined to fairly narrow limits.

"The attempt of a number of the larger countries to resolve the contradictions of their internal economies by competitive currency depreciation has served to accentuate the disequilibria in the States retaining the gold standard. Critics have pointed out that unless this tendency is checked, the sharpening of national rivalries must sooner or later pass over into the military sphere.

"Equally disturbing has been the failure of labor to obtain its share of the fruits of business recovery. Nowhere, save possibly in Germany, has employment kept pace with the gains in industrial activity. Real wages and standards of living for the working class appear to have fallen almost universally. Agriculture has also suffered a serious loss in purchasing power."

The report concludes with a deduction that such revival as has occurred will not affect the vast majority of the world's population "until consumption can be raised in line with production."

English Banking Is Cited

"In England," says the report of the Federal Reserve Board, "banking developments have been largely influenced in the past two years by the easy money policy of the Bank of England, initiated in May, 1932, in conjunction with the government's program of converting its long-term debt to a lower interest basis.

"In view of their strong cash position and the larger volume of open-market securities they now hold, the English commercial banks appear to be in a position to meet any increase in the demand for sound loans that is likely to arise. Recently advances to customers have increased somewhat."

In Canada, bank loans to customers have declined during the depression. Recently, accompanying some increase in loans and discounts, the banks' security portfolios have been moderately reduced.

In France, cash reserves of the commercial banks have been subject to wide fluctuations in recent years. In the first quarter of 1933 and the five months ending February, 1934, when the French commercial banks were called upon to provide considerable amounts of gold and foreign exchange in connection with domestic hoarding and the export of capital, they purchased gold from the Bank of France and reduced their cash reserves by more than half.

French Reserves Increase

By February, 1934, the banks' ratio of cash reserves to deposits had declined to 15 per cent, but reserves as well as the bank's cash ratio have increased again since that time as funds have returned to the country in the form of gold imports.

In Germany "declines in Reichsbank reserves in the past year and a half, unlike those in 1931, have left the commercial banks for the most part unaffected."

"During the current year," the board says, "the outward movement of gold has been approximately offset by Reichsbank purchases of securities which began last November. Meanwhile, the banks have written off losses partly through the reduction of the shareholders' capital and partly with the aid of contributions from the government.

"The decline in customer loans, which attained substantial proportions in 1931, has been at a much diminished rate."

Siles Goes To Chile As Bolivian Minister

Former President Returns To Public Life After Exile

SANTIAGO, Chile, Aug. 18—The appointment of Don Hernando Siles to be Bolivian Minister to Chile returns a former President of Bolivia to public life after four years' silence and exile.

His new status illustrates the ups and downs of South American politics. In 1926 Siles was an exile in Africa, a few months later he returned to La Paz in triumph, elected President of a country in which previously he had held numerous distinguished academic and political posts.

Four years later revolution again sent him scurrying out of the country, this time to obscurity in Chile. Here, in a gloomy suburban mansion, he passed his time in a leisurely compilation of a comparative study of American jurisprudence.

Now he is moving his possessions from the suburban mansion to the Bolivian Legation.

The new Minister, besides having been founder of the Nationalist party in Bolivia and President of that nation, has been Under Secretary of Justice and Industry, honorary professor of constitutional law in the College of Commerce at La Paz and rector of the University of Sucre. He is a member of the Spanish Academy

In 1921 he was Minister to Mexico, and later Minister to Peru. He was President of Bolivia from 1926 to 1930, when revolution forced him out of office.

International World Police Now Effective

Vienna Is European Center While New York Office Is U.S. Headquarters

Literary Digest

Times are getting harder for the criminal. The machinery of justice often moves at a snail's pace, but year by year the agencies combating crime are becoming more efficient and more effective. One important missing link in judiciary forces for years has been an international police organization, and now that link has been filled.

Unknown to the public at large, the International World Police has come into existence, and is already functioning. It is not, in itself, a police force, and it has no police powers, but it marks a significant step forward in tracking down the international criminal, for its purpose is to exchange crime data, facilitate extradition, improve police methods, and act as a general service bureau for police officials in all civilized countries. The Western offices are at New York City's police headquarters; the Eastern offices will be located in Vienna.

Just as cities and States cooperate with one another in the detection of crime in this country, so the IWP expects to aid the police in all countries. It will be a clearing house to break down the barriers of red tape which so often harass officials in seeking criminals in other lands. It will make identification of criminals easier, and their escape more difficult.

Reason for IWP

Here is the reason for the IWP as stated in its constitution drawn up recently: "Believing it to be the best interest of the leading police officials of the world to have at their service a bureau for the constant exchange of information pertaining to international crime and international criminals, this voluntary association of police executives of the world is formed."

The purpose is "the collection and dissemination of intelligence pertaining to criminals, or suspected criminals, who commit crimes in one country and seek refuge in another; or criminals whose crimes are not confined to any one nation."

The need for such a bureau has long been manifest. Not only will it exchange data and facilitate extradition, but it will study means for combating such international problems as the white-slave trade and narcotic smuggling. It will be of considerable use to American police chiefs in cities containing large foreign populations. The IWP has been functioning only a short time. While its beginnings are expected to be small, it is expected to develop gradually into an agency reaching into every part of the world. Meetings will be held every two years, the next one to be in 1935.

Maj.-Gen. John F. O'Ryan, Commissioner of Police of New York City, is President. Vice-Presidents are high police officials of Rome, Paris, Brussels, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Montreal, England, and Commissioner of Police James P. Allman of Chicago. The Secretary is New York's Deputy Chief Inspector John J. O'Connell, known as the "professor" because he is in charge of the city's police college.

An unusual aspect of the IWP is that, while police officials always had hoped for a smooth-working international crime bureau, the man who is responsible for the present bureau is a layman. He is Barron Collier, the advertising man, who controls the advertising space in the street-railway and transportation systems of the country. Sixty-one, of distinguished bearing, with gray hair and piercing gray eyes, Mr. Collier has long been active in business and civic affairs. To Floridans he is known as the State's largest landowner; to Boy Scouts he is known as Acting President of the New York Foundation.

It was a curious chain of events that brought Mr. Collier into the international police picture. In 1922 he was disturbed by newspaper reports that 1,073 persons had been killed in New York City that year by vehicles. Being an advertising man, he suggested to Police Commissioner Richard E. Enright that a monster safety campaign be organized, and the commissioner named Mr. Collier Special Deputy Police Commissioner. The drive was a success.

Becoming more interested in the police, and impressed by the amount of red tape connected with the exchange of criminal data between countries, Mr. Collier set to work to organize the International World Police, bearing virtually all expenses himself. Three years ago, when the International Criminal Police Commission, a European organization, was holding meetings in Paris, Mr. Collier got together representatives of police groups from the American association and had them attend the Paris and Rome meetings, thus laying the groundwork for a consolidation of all groups. Last year, when the International Police Conference met in Chicago, Mr. Collier brought a group of leading European police officials to this country, and further progress was made through the formation of the International World Police. The IWP conflicts in no way with the interests of other police organizations.

Mr. Collier's Views

"For police executives of the world's large cities to know each other, to sit down at a table and discuss mutual problems and methods pertaining to efficient police work throughout the world," Mr. Collier said in an interview, "is just as important as it is for a board of directors of a great corporation to sit down and discuss its problems and policies.

"It was to make these meetings possible and to assure this element of personal as well as official interest that I worked for twelve years to bring the police executives of the world's leading cities to a realization of the advantage of just such a form. The IWP is the outcome of this effort."

A One Berry Cake

The single strawberry large enough to make a short-cake measure 8½ inches in circumference, weighed 1 7-10 ounces and was the result of a botanical malformation known as "fascination." The stems and fruit of three flowers, instead of separating in the normal manner, grew together to form the abnormal berry.

Mr. T. H. Risinger, its grower, presented the berry to the Botany Department of the University of Oklahoma.

Irish Farmers Press Tax Fight

Block Waterford Roads To Harass Sheriffs Seizing Cattle For Non-Payment

The de Valera Cabinet met on August 21 and, it is understood, gave much consideration to the grave problem of the resolution of the farmers not to pay their land annuities and rates, says a Dublin scribe of the New York Times in his dispatch. Although the government's plans were not disclosed, it is learned the Cabinet considered raising an auxiliary police force.

The government continues to take action against farmers refusing to pay taxes. Exciting scenes occurred in Dunhill, County Waterford, today when Sheriff's officers, accompanied by a large police detail, seized cattle belonging to four farmers for default in the payment of land annuities. While seizures were being made on the first farm, farmers blocked the roads leading to the remaining farms with barricades of stones and felled trees. The police after much labor removed the obstructions.

As the cattle were being driven to the railway station, the farmers made a hostile demonstration. At the station the farmers appealed to passengers to leave a train as a protest against the seizures. Several passengers acceded.

Text of Resolution Issued

General Owen O'Duffy's Blue Shirt organization issued tonight the text of a series of resolutions adopted at the first Blue Shirt convention, held privately in Dublin last week-end.

One resolution, on land annuities, counsels farmers to withhold payments in certain contingencies. This may precipitate government action if the President's legal advisers declare its terms a breach of the Public Safety Act. This resolution, unanimously adopted by delegates from every county, declares:

"In view of the effect of the government's policy in destroying farming profits and reducing laborers' wages, this congress calls upon the United Ireland (O'Duffy party) Executive to demand the collection of land annuities, rates on agricultural lands and all rents of laborers' cottages be stopped, at least until agricultural prosperity has been restored.

"If the Fianna Fail (government party) will not accede to this demand, this congress recommends that the government be asked to set up immediately an impartial tribunal, presided over by an experienced judge, to inquire into the fairness of asking farmers and laborers to pay these charges under the existing circumstances, and that evictions, seizures and sheriffs' sales shall cease until this tribunal has issued its decision.

"In case the government will neither accede to this demand for relief nor refer it to a tribunal, this congress calls on all farmers to refuse to pay annuities and on laborers to refuse to pay cottage rents."

Plan to Organize in Ulster

The Blue Shirts have decided to organize units in Northern Ireland and to appoint a commissioner for the six counties. This development is disclosed in the text of another resolution. The Blue Shirts say they are taking this step "in view of the existing isolation of the Northern Nationalists from those in the South and in view of the fact that, although the Fianna Fail has had two and one-half years in office, President Eamon de Valera himself has been elected a member of the Northern Irish Parliament; no step has been taken to end the unnatural boundary of the country."

Members of Viscount Craigavon's Cabinet have already denounced the Blue Shirts and it is expected they will issue a decree outlawing the group within their territory.

If General O'Duffy's organization should succeed in obtaining control of the government in the Free State, Tara, County Meath, where the ancient kings of Ireland resided up to the end of the sixth century, is to be restored as a place of political importance. At the recent Blue Shirt congress a resolution was adopted strongly urging "the advisability of restoring Tara, at least symbolically, to its historic position as the capital of the Irish nation."

The Blue Shirts, if placed in power, contemplate building a palace of victory upon Tara Hill on the site of the palace of the ancient Irish kings. In this palace would reside the head of the State, who would be inaugurated with ceremonial pomp in the presence of the Dail Eireann, brought especially from Dublin.

"We plan to make Tara the Versailles of the Irish Free State," a prominent Blue Shirt leader told your correspondent.

15,000 Youths To Gather At Boy Scout Jamboree

Australians Prepare 350-Acre Camp Site For Guests From All Parts Of World

What was simply bush land but a short while ago is rapidly being converted into a splendidly organized canvas city which will spring to life when the Australian Jamboree commences on 27th December this year. Near the fashionable watering-place called Frankston, in the State of Victoria, Australia, there are 350 acres of picturesque country which has been chosen as the site for the Jamboree Camp at which it is confidently estimated 15,000 members of the Boy Scout movement will assemble for the first international gathering of this nature to be held in the Southern Hemisphere. Over one hundred and fifty experts, working through fifteen committees under the control of a central council, are concentrating their time and talents to make this Jamboree Camp an outstanding success, and already the preliminary work is well under way.

Commencing with the clearing of the dense undergrowth on this beautiful country, every care is being exercised to preserve the typically Australian "bush" aspect of the camp site. With the judicious clearing of some of the timber, entrancing vistas have been unfolded, and in other parts where the timber has been untouched there are ideal camp sites shaded by the luxuriant foliage of the native trees. Within half a mile of the Jamboree Camp is a huge reservoir, and gangs of workmen are engaged in digging the trenches which will contain the pipes conveying the water supply to all parts of the camp. The State electric power plant will be used to illuminate the thoroughfares of this great camp. The Frankston Shire Council and the Country Roads Board are preparing all roads leading to the camp.

Guest Houses Near Camp

In the surrounding districts, outside the camp reserve, guest houses capable of accommodating a large influx of visitors are being renovated, and in some instances, enlarged, whilst others are being built. On the foreshore of Port Phillip Bay a vast camp for motorists is being constructed where motorists may picnic and camp, and for a small charge they may have the use of gas-stoves, ovens and drying rooms. Motor carrying companies have intimated that they are planning large fleets of the most modern and comfortable vehicles to convey huge crowds to the Jamboree Camp, whilst the State Railways Department has guaranteed special train facilities. To the camp itself concrete and bitumen surfaced roads are being constructed to facilitate the easy flow of traffic. These are but a few of the many plans which are being carried out on and around the Jamboree Camp site, and as the days roll on towards December this campaign of organizing will be intensified.

Some of the most elaborate planning will be done in connection with the great arena, which is capable of accommodating 25,000 Scouts. The portion of the camp selected for this arena is being levelled and planted with grass, whilst around its borders there will spring up capacious grandstands. Adjoining the arena will be an expansive marshalling ground, where the participants in displays and pageants will assemble before entering the arena.

Builders are hammering and moulding the component parts of what will be the administrative block at the camp, and already the skeletons of buildings are taking shape. There will be thousands of square feet of office accommodation in this big block. Nearby will be one of the largest Scout Shops in the world, equipped with everything that a Scout needs from a needle to a marquee. Near this Scout Shop will be the shopping area which will cover several acres where articles of every description may be purchased from approved vendors.

Five Sub-Camps

The basic lay-out of the camp provides for five sub-camps—Headquarters camp, Supply camp, Scouters' camp, Lady Scouters' camp, Rover camp—and the hostel. Then in another part there will be a fully-staffed hospital and ambulance cars.

The provisioning of the camp has been the subject of the most careful consideration. Acres of vegetables will be planted to provide that section of the camp supplies. As this part of the country is famed for its orchards and poultry farms, excellent provisions have been guaranteed by farmers in the district. All meat will be brought to the camp on hoof, killed, inspected, and cut up under the supervision of the Quartermaster.

Particular attention has been paid to the allotting of spacious camp sites to the various nationalities to permit of the establishing of camps characteristic of the countries whence the contingents come.

Some idea of the standard of camping amongst troops in the State of Victoria will be conveyed by a series of model camps which will be dotted over this splendid domain.

Judging by information received at the Melbourne headquarters it would seem that the popularity of the Jamboree will be even greater than was at first optimistically anticipated. Plans are being based upon an estimated attendance of 15,000 Scouts, but the organization is such that, in the event of that grand total being exceeded, then the general plan can be expanded without difficulty.

Simultaneously with the holding of this great Jamboree there will be the Centenary Celebrations of the City of Melbourne and the State of Victoria. It is anticipated that these celebrations will attract visitors from all parts of the world.

Important Visitors

Latest advice shows there will be many visitors of note at the Jamboree. In addition to Lord and Lady Baden Powell there will be several notables from Great Britain, America, Holland, Hungary, India, South Africa, New Zealand and Japan are also expected to send guests who are well-known, and important visitors from other countries are also likely.

Notifications of the numbers attending from foreign countries are not due for another month, but the indications are that almost all the Pacific countries, including the United States, South America, Japan, China, Fiji, Honolulu, parts of the East Indies and New Zealand will be well represented. Further abroad, there will be Scouts from Europe and South Africa.

When it is realized that these visitors speak different languages, the difficulties of the organizers will be apparent. A large group of interpreters is being enlisted, and with their aid it will be possible for all those at the camp to converse.

Ceylon May Curb Japan's Large Trade In Cotton

Feeling Running High Over Restriction Of Goods From Orient

COLOMBO, Ceyon—Feeling is running high in Ceylon over the restriction of the imports of cotton piece goods and rayon from countries outside the British Empire as from May 7. The Board of Ministers, as announced in the House of Commons, had declined to act in the matter. The Governor was thereupon empowered to make the necessary regulations by a special Order in Council. So expeditiously were the arrangements carried out that the exhaustion of the Japanese quota for the current year was proclaimed on the seventh day after the Order in Council was made in London and a few hours after the publication here of the regulations framed thereunder.

The quota scheme has become and threatens to remain a political issue, though the main ground of opposition hitherto has been economic, namely, that cheap clothing materials have been a boon to the middle and lower classes, who have been hard hit by the trade depression and are not yet in a position to pay the higher prices resulting from a severe restriction of Japanese imports. It would have been indeed strange if councillors elected on the basis of adult franchise had adopted any other attitude. Moreover, almost all Ceylonese public men are firm believers in free trade, and are unwilling to consider any deviation from this principle except for the purpose of protecting local industries.

A few rural industries such as poultry breeding, sheep and goat farming, and vegetable gardening have been afforded some measure of protection, but the paddy industry, which is languishing, has been informed more than once that a protective tariff cannot be adopted because rice would become more costly to the consumer. The staple food of the people is thus imported under free-trade conditions at an annual cost of £3,300,000. The land under paddy is estimated at over 800,000 acres, as against 450,000 acres under tea and 530,000 acres under rubber. It is therefore felt that the authorities in resorting to extraordinary legislation to introduce the quota system for textile have violated a deeply cherished principle and infringed the right of fiscal autonomy conceded to the Ceylon legislature.

Boycott Advocated

The boycott of British extiles is advocated in some quarters as the only weapon available to a subject people and as an effective method of making the people of England realize he feeling of injustice under which people here are smarting. Another suggestion is that the circumstances are opportune for cloth manufacture with the State's financial support.

So far as the immediate future is concerned, there is no ground for anticipating any appreciable rise in the prices of cotton piece goods since the imports in the first half of the current year are well above two-thirds of the average annual total for the period 1927-1933. The following are the detailed figures:—

Textile Imports into Ceylon in Yards
(to the nearest thousand)

Cotton piece goods	Average annual total for 1927-33	Total for first half year 1934
Bleached	17,148,000	10,683,000
Dyed	24,845,000	20,527,000
Grey	3,729,000	2,835,000
Printed	15,736,000	9,433,000
Total	61,518,000	43,478,000

Japan's share in the first six months of 1934 was:—Bleached, 9,230,000 yards; dyed, 15,130,000 yards; grey, 2,435,000 yards; printed, 8,504,000 yards total, 35,299,000 yards.

As the stocks of Japanese goods are depleted, however, their prices are likely to rise progressively to about double the rates that obtained until a few days ago, unless British cloth can be placed in this market at drastically reduced prices. And the situation so far as the consumer in Ceylon is concerned will be much worse in 1935 and the succeeding years when imports from Japan are to be limited to a total of 11,682,574 yards distributed as follows:—Bleached, 2,277,243 yards; dyed, 2,471,892 yards; grey, 314,000 yards; printed, 6,619,439 yards. Whether these quotas are exhausted in two or three months or spread over a slightly longer period, a serious shortage of the cheaper classes of goods is likely to be felt by about April next year.

Percentages of Trade

According to some, India would be in a position to make good the deficiency and become the principal gainer from the quota scheme as Indian cloth, in point of value, occupies an intermediate position between Japanese and British varieties. This expectation does not appear to bejustified in view of the fact that except in the case of dyed fabrics India's share of the total imports into Ceylon is negligible. The percentage distribution of the total trade in 1933 as between the important sources supply was as follows:—

The total quantities of these goods imported into Ceylon in 1933 from all sources were— Bleached, 16,885,000 yards; dyed, 26,407,000, yards; grey, 3,611,000 yards; printed, 11,185,000 yards.

The comparative values of the British, Japanese, and Indian piece goods computed from the Customs Returns were as follows for the period January-June, 1914:—

Value per 10 yards of cloth in Ceylon currency (Rs. 1=1s. 6d.)

Cotton piece goods	U.K. goods Rs. c.	Japanese goods Rs. c.	Indian goods Rs. c.
Bleached	3.42	1.31	2.32
Dyed	3.95	1.41	2.13
Grey	2.98	1.19	—

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Attack on the U.S.A.

On July 21, 1918, at about 10:30 a.m., the German submarine U-156 suddenly rose to the surface some 2½ miles off Orleans, Mass., on the southeastern elbow of Cape Cod, and sank the tug "Perth Amboy" and 4 barges by gunfire. Of the several hundred shells fired, a few landed on American soil, barely missing some cottagers watching the fray. The sub also deliberately fired on the lifesavers from the Neuset Harbor Station as they pulled a boat alongside the sinking hulks.

There were 16 men on the tug and 10 on the four barges, a few of whom were wounded. The U-156 subsequently was lost in the great mine field laid across the North Sea.

The Demon Photographer

Adrian C. Duff, a newspaper photographer in New York, enlisted as a sergeant of the U.S. Signal Corps when America entered the World War. He soon became known as the "Camera Kid" or the "Demon Photographer," for his intrepidity in taking pictures in the midst of bullets and shellfire.

In July 1918 at Chateau Theirry, Duff, who was unarmed except for a camera, suddenly came upon a camouflaged German machine-gun nest. He walked over and, training his camera upon the frightened Germans, ordered them to put up their hands. The 6 Germans complied. Duff photographed them and then escorted the prisoners to the American lines.

Duff was promoted to Lieutenant. He died in an automobile accident in Brooklyn, March 7, 1920, when his car skidded on the ice of the pavement.

Trade On Yangtze Is Most Important To China Today

Decrease In River Business Noted During The Past Few Years

The foreign trade of China will become nil if foreign trade on the Yangtze river in China is excluded. Trade on the biggest river in China is conducted at the twelve open ports on the river including Shanghai, the center of foreign trade in China, Chungking, Hankow, Wanhsien, Ichang, Changsha, Shasi, Yochow, Wuhu, Chinkiang, Kyukiang, and Nanking. The average annual foreign trade of China for the five years, 1927-31 was 3,500,000,000 yuan in value, but the figure decreased to 2,400,000,000 yuan in 1932. Moreover, a further decrease was witnessed in 1933, when it was only 2,000,000,000 yuan. The average foreign trade on the Yangtze river, for the five years, 1927-31 occupied fifty per cent of that of the whole of China. Moreover, it must be noted that 58 per cent of the foreign trade of the whole of China in 1933 was represented by foreign trade on the Yangtze river, though a slight decrease was witnessed in 1932 when the percentage was 48. If we divide China's foreign trade for 1931 into four parts for convenience' sake, that is, the Yangtze, North China, South China and Manchuria, the Yangtze region occupied 51 per cent of the total trade volume, North China 14 per cent, South China 15 per cent, and Manchuria 20 per cent. But with the advent of Manchuria, foreign trade on the Yangtze river has come to occupy 58 per cent of the whole foreign trade of China, North China 18 per cent, and South China 24 per cent.

China's foreign trade had been on the increase up to 1931 when the remarkable figure of 3,673,000,000 yuan was registered. It has since decreased owing to the sudden rise of the price of silver. Especially so heavy was the blow dealt China's foreign trade by the Manchurian and Shanghai incidents that the total amount of foreign trade in China in 1931 fell to 2,424,000,000 yuan. Moreover, the decrease continued in the following year when the figure was less than 1,971,000,000 yuan. This downward tendency is feared to continue several years to come.

Subjoined is the table showing the foreign trade of whole China during the past ten years from 1924 to 1933:

(In millions of yuan)

Year	Imports	Exports	Total	Unfavorable Balance
1924 ...	1,586	1,203	2,789	383
1925 ...	1,477	1,209	2,686	268
1926 ...	1,751	1,346	3,097	405
1927 ...	1,578	1,432	3,010	146
1928 ...	1,863	1,544	3,407	319
1929 ...	2,041	1,394	3,435	647
1931 ...	2,256	1,417	3,673	839
1932 ...	1,636	769	2,424	857
1933 ...	1,359	612	1,971	747

In this connection, it must be noted that China started the systematic anti-foreign movement, especially anti-Japanese movement in 1925. With the aggravation of the anti-Japanese movement, China's incoming trade has increased remarkably owing to a reduction in the productive power, and also internal strifes.

In 1927 China's foreign trade showed a decrease of $6,000,000 yuan as the result of the occupation of the Yangtze region by the revolutionary army. But an increase of 310,000,000 yuan was witnessed in 1928 with a decrease in imports by 85,000,000 yuan from 1926. In 1930 export trade showed a decrease of 190,000,000 yuan against the previous year while an influx of foreign currencies took place. The year 1931 proved worse for China with the inundation of the Yangtze river which reduced the farmers to a sorry plight, the outbreak of the Manchurian incident, and the consequent anti-Japanese movement throughout China, with the result that China's foreign trade further dwindled. Moreover, with the outbreak of the Shanghai incident in 1932 China's export trade decreased by 60,000,000 yuan and import trade by 65,000,000 yuan from the previous year. A further slump was recorded in export and import trade in 1933 as the result of the independence of Manchoukuo and the enforcement of a prohibitive high tariff by the Nanking Government. Thus a decrease of 14.5 per cent in import trade and a decrease of 50 per cent in export trade against that of 1924 was witnessed.

The subjoined table shows the percentage of increase and decrease of foreign trade in China during the past eight years beginning 1926 and ending 1933:

The first period (1926-27)	11.52
The second period (1928-29) ..	27.13
The third period (1930-31)	29.80
The fourth period (1932-33) ..	19.74

N.B.:—(-) shows decrease. The foreign trade for 1924-25 is taken as 100.

N. B. (-) shows decrease.

N. B. The Foreign trade for 1924-25 is taken as 100.

As may be seen, during the three periods under review, China's foreign trade was on the increase showing the percentage of 30 but a decrease was registered in the fourth period when it decreased by 19.74 per cent. This was a decrease of 38 per cent against that of the first three periods. Incidentally, it may be interesting to note that since the establishment of the maritime customs system there has been no favorable balance registered in the foreign trade of China.

Subjoined is the table showing the foreign trade of China classified by foreign countries during the past five years:

	1929	1930	1931	1932	1933
Japan	528	532	478	241	136
Britain	186	169	187	186	154
America ..	360	362	501	412	297
Germany .	105	108	130	112	108
Other countries ...	794	870	961	627	663
Total ..	1,973	2,041	2,257	1,655	1,353

It may be noted that up to 1930 Japan led the other countries in trade with China but she fell to second in 1931 when the Manchurian incident broke out, being replaced by America. Japan was also second next year, America still ranking first by exporting goods to China two times as much as that of Japan. In 1933 Japan fell to third owing to a high tariff applied by the Nanking Government against merchandise of Japanese origin.

Film Magazines To Oppose Curb

West Coast Writers Meet To Plan Resistance To Censoring By Studios

HOLLYWOOD, Calif., Aug. 11—An indication that editors and writers for the magazines devoted to motion picture news and interviews will fight the censorship imposed by the studios was heard here today.

The studios have agreed, through their publicity directors who met Thursday with Joseph I. Breen, film code administrator, that players would not be made available for interviews unless the writer agrees to submit his article for approval before publication.

This move against the 300-odd movie magazine writers in Hollywood was taken, it was learned, to curb the activities of a few writers whose "misrepresentations and exaggregations" haev caused embarrassment to stars and their employers.

A meeting of West Coast representatives of the magazines was held today, but no statement of their plans was issued. But it was said that particular exception was taken to "piped" stories, those written about picture personages without the customary routine of an interview, and the refusals of certain writers to respect confidences.

Most of the fan magazine writers who were asked for comments on the restrictions said that they could not speak without authority of their editors in New York.

Coincidentally, a $500,000 damage suit was filed in Federal Court against the magazine "Modern Screen" by George Webb, film actor and director, whose former wife, Esther Ralston, actress, obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from him on March 8.

Charging that he was called a "Simon Legree" in a purported interview with Miss Ralston in the July issue of the magazine, Mr. Webb contended that his reputation had been damaged. The suit named the following as defendants:

The Bell Publishing Company of Dunellen, N. J.

Gladys Hall of Beverley Hills, asserted author of the article, entitled "Could You Have Borne Such Pain?"

Mary Burgum of New York City, asserted editor.

Walter Ramsay of Hollywood.

The article, filed with the complaint, purportedly described intimate details of the life of Miss Ralston from the time she was 2 years old until she sued Mr. Webb for divorce.

Miss Ralston was alleged to have been quoted as calling Mr. Webb a "Simon Legree, who used the whip of compulsion" over her, and as saying that he had a "suicide complex," that he "threatened his own suicide, and tried to induce me to enter into a suicide pact with him."

Stromboli Starts Unusual Eruption To Scare People

Inhabitants Cast Anxious Eyes Toward Summit Of Europe's Most Active Volcano

Nearly two thousand people, living on the slopes of Stromboli, Europe's most active volcano, recently turned anxious eyes toward the summit, watched a phenomenal display of pyrotechnics, and hoped that eruptions of the past that have devastated the island, would not be repeated.

"Normally Stromboli has its daily 'spasms'—rumbling, hissing, and flashing lights that would terrify the bravest tourist; but Strombolians are no more frightened by these 'spasms' than a New Yorker is disturbed by the backfire of an automobile on Broadway," says a bulletin from the Washington, D. C. headquarters of the National Georaphic Society.

Small Eruptions Unnotized

"Shaped like a giant cone, eight miles in circumference at its base, and rising above the Mediterranean more than 3,000 feet, Stromboli is, in reality a burning island. Because light flares from its crater many times during the night, it has been called the 'Lighthouse of the Mediterranean'. Famed as the legendary home of Aeolus, King of the Winds, it is the northernmost of the Lipari Archpelago, a group of eight islands about fifty miles north of the 'toe' of the Italian 'boot'.

"During the small daily eruptions, molten masses of lava, hot stones and ashes are thrown into the air; but most of it falls back into the cavernous maw only to be reheated and thrust up again with the next explosion of lava bubbles. Now and then, however, more serious eruptions throw the masses over the crater rim to fall into the inhabited regions on the lower slopes. Less frequently, yet too frequently for the inhabitants, there is a major eruption such as that of September 1930 when farms and vineyards were destroyed, homes of natives leveled, and the whole island and surrounding sea enveloped in deadly sulphur-laden fumes.

"Stomboli perpetually emits smoke and steam. Although at a distance, it appears that the whole summit is burning, the crater, circular in form and about 170 yards in diameter, is about one-third of the way down the northwest side of the mountain.

Connoisseurs Praise Stromboli Wine

"Most of Stromboli's inhabitants live in and near two villages; San Vincenzo at the northern extremity of the island and Ginostra on the southwest side. The remainder are sprinkled over the fertile ground on the slopes where they eke out a living growing small quantities of figs, and making wine that some wheat, barley, cotton, currants, and connoisseurs call the finest in the Mediterranean.

"There is no wire communication between the Italian mainland and Stromboli, so that except for the call, its it is isolated. The Liparis weekly steamers form Messina that once were famous as the Devil's Islands of Italy but prisoners now are exiled only to the small volcanic islet, Ustica. Lipari Island, the largest in the archipelago is the chief island of the group and has about 12,000 inhabitants. Its chief assets are deposits of pumice and volcanic glass recovered from an extinct crater.

His Honor the Spy

Lieut. Col. Max von Schwartzkoppen was for many years German military attache in Paris and as such was known to the French Counter-Espionage as the head of the German Spy System in France. The French read and copied every military document which Schwartzkoppen was able to obtain from spies under his orders. But to lull him into a sense of security, the French President twice conferred the Legion of Honor upon the chief spy. He received in rapid succession the Cross of a Chevalier and that of a Commander of the Legion.

Schwartzkoppen played a tragic part in the fate of Captain Dreyfus who innocently spent 5 years on Devil's Island.

Archduke of Spinach

General Leopold Salvator, Archduke of Austria (1863-1931) being denied the command of an army in the World War, was consoled by an appointment as Inspector of artillery. As such he began to engage in large army deliveries of dried vegetables on his own account.

The soldiers referred to him as Dörrgemüs-Salvator (Salvator of the dried vegetables) and his product was known as "Salvatorkraut" (Salvator Herbs), or "Dratverhau" ("barbed wire").

His false spinach, of which he supplied $2,000,000 worth to the Army, did not cost him a cent. Convalescent soldiers in hospitals, receiving 2 cents a day from the Government, were required to collect nettles in the field. These were dried and sold by the Archduke to the Government as spinach.

Inhabitants Go Back to St. Kilda

Isolated Island Three Miles Long And Less Than Two Miles Wide

St. Kilda, isolated island off the northwest coast of Scotland came into the news about three years ago when its thirty-five inhabitants deserted it. Recently its name again appeared in the headlines of the American press when a few of the "deserters" accompanied by a recent purchaser of the island, temporarily returned.

"St. Kilda is only about three miles long and less than two miles wide, yet is the largest of about sixteen islets that break the surface of the Atlantic Ocean about fifty miles west of the Hebrides Islands, or a hundred miles west of the northern coast of Scotland," says a bulletin from the Washington, D. C. headquarters of the National Geographic Society.

Population Dwindled

"It is so tiny that only large scale maps mention it; but if one wishes to locate it, one may do so by drawing a line due northward from the eastern environs of Limerick, Ireland. St. Kilda is situated on that line about twelve miles south of the 58th degree of north latitude.

"There is not enough space on the island for a large population, but St. Kilda has not even held its own. In 1851 it had 110 Gaelic-speaking inhabitants—the entire population. In 1891 census enumerators reported 71, while in 1928 there were only 45. When the island was permanently populated about forty acres were arable. Besides farming, the islanders raised sheep.

"Like many of the islands off the north of Scotland, St. Kilda rises in sheer cliffs out of deep water. The maximum height is 1,220 feet. The few travellers who have braved the currents about St. Kilda and the neighboring islets, and have gone ashore at its single landing place on the east side, have been fascinated summer months. Atlantic waves dash by the island's beauty during the summer months. Atlantic waves dash against its sides with a mighty fury. They have dug caves and carved strange designs in the cliffs. Frequent recesses in the cliffs are popular perches for many birds whose feathers, meat, and oil were among the chief sources of income of the islanders in the past.

Party Will Remain A Month

"The St. Kilda party, it is reported, will remain on the island about a month, the members spending their time catching the sheep that now are wild. From the wool they will weave St. Kilda cloth which has long been famous in the British Isles.

"When St. Kilda was permanently populated, the inhabitants were partially isolated or eight months of the year. It took the sturdiest of people to withstand the chill winds of hurricane force that swept the island during the winter months."

Sweden Attains Order Through Economic Plan

Avoids Dictatorial Fiats Or Socialist Extremism In Solving Problems

As our great objective in the United States at present seems to be to set up a system of planned economy, it is opportune to look around and see what has been done along this line in other countries says Mr. Alfred J. Pearson, former American Minister to Poland and Finland in the New York Herald Tribune. His article in full follows:

Sweden has succeeded better than any other country in Europe in setting its house in order, and it has done so by a system of planned economy. At the same time that it has not gone to an extreme in the process of socialization, it has brought capitalism under control by definitely cubing the profit motive and, where necessary, by abolishing it.

This system did not grow up in Sweden over night. It is not the result of the fiat of a dictator or the waving of a magic wand. It was achieved through the study and experimentation by representative men in practically all lines of economic activity, working together sympathetically during a period of forty or fifty years in an attempt to devise a form of government that would bring the greatest good to the greatest number.

Co-operative Aid in System

In their attempt to solve the problem, the Swedish economists relied chiefly on state investments and co-operative organizations, the latter including both production and consumption.

The state has an investment of approximately $800,000,000 in various forms of industrial enterprises yielding a profit of close to 7 per cent. It owns and operates one-fourth of the forest area, one-third of the mines. It owns and operate the rail way, telegraph and telephone systems. Its power plants generate 34 per cent of the electricity used throughout the country and 80 per cent of the electricity used by families in their homes. Electricity is extensively used for cooking in Swedish households because of the cheap rate at which it can be supplied.

The state derives a considerable revenue from the sale of tobacco and a large income from the control and sale of liquor. In taking over the management of the liquor trade the state had two definite objectives: First, social improvement; second, additional income for government expenditures. This is a subject that could profitably be examined in minute detail, but here I can only say that the Bratt system for the sale of liquor has been remarkably successful, both in social improvement and state revenues.

Radio Aids Revenues

Broadcasting of radio program is also a source of revenue to the state. Instead of retaining a direct monopoly of all broadcasting, the state caused a private company to be organized, to which it gave the right to broadcast all programs. In addition to the tax on radio sets, the profits of the company above a fixed amount considered equitable for the money invested and the cost of operation belong to the state.

The second agency of outstanding importance in the building of a planned economy system in Sweden is the co-operative organization of various forms of industrial enterprise. The co-operatives own and operate 10 per cent of all plants, manufacturing goods for domestic consumption. They control and manage close to one-half of the wholesale trade in foodstuffs, shoes and clothing. In the larger cities they erect large apartment buildings and sell apartments to private persons cheaper than they could otherwise be obtained. Here, too, the profit motive has been decisively curbed. Prices are controlled. High-class workmanship is assured. The gainer is the forgotten man, the man in the street. The general average of living conditions is raised.

I must not forget to mention the consumer co-operatives. This organization, engaged in the manufacture and the sale of various forms of goods, has played a large and important part not only in the reconstruction and the improvement of the economic life of the Swedish nation, but also in England, Russia, Italy, Germany and Denmark.

In seeking reasons for the prosperous condition of Sweden at a time when other nations are still suffering from the depression, we must not make the mistake of attributing everything that makes for a better state of affairs to one or two things. State control and co-operative organizations have been the leading factors. There are several contributing causes, which would require treatment in a more extensive study of this question, but which space will not permit me to discuss here.

This, however, we must not forget: Sweden has managed to keep out of war for over a hundred years, enabling her to devote a large part of her resources and her energy to the immediate betterment of social and economic conditions.

Uruguay Ready To Build Great Island Airport

$1,215,000 Shelter, Largest In South America, Under Construction By Nov. 1

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay, Aug. 18—Announcement of plans for a 1,500,000 gold peso (¥1,215,000) airport, to be the greatest in South America, puts Uruguay in line to share the rapidly developing air-mail service.

At the same time, Air France set a new three and a half day Paris-Buenos Aires mail service, coinciding with a weekly six-day Buenos Aires-Berlin air mail, and the preliminary plans of a new Buenos Aires-New York route through Asuncion, Corumba, Manaos, Havana and the Bermudas, approved by Argentina at the request of Trans-Equator Airlines.

Pending for five years, the announcement of the airport here to be started before November 1 was believed inspired by these indications of rapid air growth, and by the recent visit of the Graf Zeppelin to Montevideo and Buenos Aires.

President Gabriel Terra heartily approves the airport, and has remarked that "air services will always receive preferential treatment in Uruguay."

Libertad Island, in the center of Montevideo Bay, will be the site of the new airport. The island, about seventeen acres in area, would be ten minutes by ferry from the mainland city. It has been in use for three years as a temporary naval base, and a partial landing port was made through the building of a 250-meter breakwater. This will be extended 700 meters, in a triangular form, against which will about a further breakwater of 800 meters length.

The harbor formed will shelte fifty seaplanes from storms. A hangar-shelter, 235 by 455 feet, is planned, while other buildings would include a hotel, restaurant, tennis courts, swimming pools, besides customs and post and telegraph offices. The airport is scheduled to be completed in two years.

US Post Officials Plan Air Mail To Alaska Soon

Seattle or Tacoma, to Fairbanks.

Such an air line, Mr. Branch pointed out, would cut the time of mail, passenger and express transportation from the mainland to Alaska from eight days to a day and a half. The provision of swifter communication than is now available, involving establishment of a properly equipped air route, it is believed, would aid greatly in the development of the territory and would be an important contribution to the national defense.

American aviation interests, it was recalled, long have advocated government assistance in the development of regularly scheduled transoceanic airplane services. It has been argued that the national prestige would be enhanced by enabling American lines to get into this field before foreign companies are able to initiate such services.

Competitive bidding for the air-mail contracts on the contemplated routes, once they are determined upon, undoubtedly will be insisted upon, but it is generally conceded that Pan-American Airways is in the best position to go after the transoceanic services. It has behind it already six years of experience in service to Caribbean and other South American ports. Moreover, it has in operation the first of three giant Sikorsky seaplanes, holder of eight world records, capable of carrying thirty-two passengers and 2,500 pounds of mail or express 2,000 miles at 160 miles an hour.

In addition to the two additional planes of this type which it has under contract, the first of three other similar ships, reported to have even greater range and speed, which it has ordered from the Glenn Martin plant at Baltimore is nearing completition. A fleet of six such sea transports, it is recognized, would put this company in a position to initiate a trans-Atlantic air-mail service on short notice.

League Looks To USSR For Curb On Chancellor

France and Russia are interested in the Saar. They think that the chance of Germany's losing the plebiscite is slight, but they are convinced that should Germany lose the vote the Nazis would take the territory in a swift drive.

League to Support France

Against such action the League of Nations, with Russia in its membership, would certainly move, and it would not be the League of the weary Sino-Japanese debate. Europe will support France and Russia this winter. If the League powers facilitated Germany's expansions by the Baltic and toward the Adriatic they would drive France and Russia to a preventive war.

Neither France nor Russia has any doubts of the ultimate program of German industrialists and generals, or their ability to achieve it after these first expansions. Nor have the other powers any doubts so long as Hitler, Goebbels and Schacht are making the German people see things under the bed.

Butler Scores Radicals For Wide Poverty Talk

Until the ideal of service dominates every form of human effort, including the profit-motive itself, liberty will not be secure.

"We are told by many voices that the free competitive system in production which liberty invites, has failed and must necessarily fail since under its operation there can be no orderly balance between production and consumption. Therefore it is said that at whatever cost public control or compulsion must displace liberty in order that there may be no unemployment and that consumption and production may be in balance.

"But the matter cannot be so easily dealt with. As a matter of fact, the true reason for the conditions which have called forth this criticism of liberty in more lands than one, is that our world of sovereign nations has not yet been able or willing to adjust itself to those modern conditions which man's new control over nature and the discoveries of modern science have brought about."

At another point Dr. Butler alluded to the policies of economic nationalism which had resulted in the setting up of tariff barriers by the various countries.

"The natural and necessary effect of this policy," he said, "could only be to offer artificial stimulation to the production of certain articles behind the barriers of these protective tariffs while completely destroying the balance and consumption, of supply and demand, in the world at large. In due time this destruction of the balance between production and consumption extends to each and every individual nation and wrecks its prosperity."

Favors Taxes for All

Discussing taxation problems, Dr. Butler said:

"There is a very subtle mode of seeking to undermine liberty and liberalism, without in anywise either changing the form of our government or appearing to alter the foundation upon which it rests; that is by the use of the taxing power in the interest not of the whole people, but of groups and sections. If there is to be a just and wise use of the taxing power and an equally wise and just expenditure of public funds, then those by whose authority the taxes are laid must themselves help to pay the tax and be made tax-conscious thereby."

beasts which killed her father.

Chubby Guilfoyle was once a trainer in the Dallas zoo. He has had many years' experience as a trainer, having formerly been connected with Bostock's Circus in the cage with the full-grown lions, which are known as "bouncers," a dangerous breed. He lost one of his arms when a bad lion attacked him during an exhibition.

Dean Foix is one of the few trainers who can handle the "mixed" cages, including the South African lions, the pumas, leopards and tigers. The South African lions are the deadliest of lions. The pumas are the quickest of all jungle beasts and the leopards are the most treacherous.

All these trainers and animals are employed at the old Selig Zoo, now renovated and in operation in Los Angeles. Performances are given each afternoon, and each afternoon the men risk their lives to give the public a thrill.

"I WAS A SPY" AT HIBIYA GEKIJO

Directed by Victor Saville, a Fox-Gaumont-British picture, "I was a Spy" is at the Hibiya Gekijo this week.

Three outstanding players are featured in this film, Madeleine Carroll, Herbert Marshall and Conrad Veidt.

Miss Carroll, a favorite of the London stage and screen is in private life, the wife of Captain Philip Astley. Her special subject for her degree at Birmingham University was medieval pottery. Her husband owns a large estate in Herefordshire.

Supporting Miss Carroll are Herbert Marshall, who will be remembered for his playing opposite Marlene Dietrich in "The Blond Venus." Conrad Veidt who plays the part of the German Commandant has appeared in nearly every great German film, starting a sensational career in "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari. His appearance in "Congress Dance" will be remembered by Tokyo audiences, and Towa Shoji promises this fine actor in "The Black Huzar" which will be a release of the next few months.

"I Was a Spy," is the story of the heroic young Belgian woman, Martha McKenna, wife of a British officer, who was a hospital nurse during the war and engaged in secret service work for the Allies.

The war time adventures of Martha McKenna are said to make one of the most thrilling stories of heroism that has yet been adapted to the screen. As a spy and a sister of mercy, Martha McKenna spent two years of her life liking after the conveyed military secrets to German wounded in Belgium and Germany's enemies.

Finally her activities were discovered; she was court-martialled and condemned to be shot. But on account of her service to Germany the sentence was cammunted to the of imprisonment for liffe. That sentence she fully expected to serve ,but the defeate of Gerany opened the prison gates to her release.

The whole of the action of "I Was a Spy" takes place behind the German lines, and many big sets, such as the Square at Roulers, were specially constructed for the picture. Some of the exteriors were made at Flanders, where the McKennas are now living in undisturbed peace. It is reported that these sets were constructed so realistically, that they represent as nearly as is possible the actual landmarks of the war.

Gov. Pinchot Put In Dilemma By U.S. President

Former Is Issued Federal Ultimatum By Hopkins On Relief Issue

Through a Federal ultimatum to the State of Pennsylvania, President Roosevelt was credited on Sept. 1 by Democratic leaders with having put Governor Gifford Pinchot politically "on the spot," says the New York Herald Tribune.

The ultimatum is a letter from Herry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator, notifying Governor Pinchot that Washington's major contribution for the relief of Pennsylvania's 1,200,000 unemployed and needy will be discontinued today unless the state acts decisively to shoulder its share of the burden.

90 Per Cent of Bill Paid by U. S.

Since March the Federal government has paid about 90 per cent of the bill for supporting the destitute in the second most populous state of the Union. Governor Pinchot has been resisting pressure that he call the Legislature in session to shoulder the state's reasonable share of the burden.

With the Federal contribution out off, after steady payments aggregating $54,000,000, it is believed that the Governor has no alternative but to summon the Legislature. Democratic state leaders point to the obvious political hazard to the Governor in a session of the Legislature.

Should the Republican Legislature fail to appropriate adequately for public relief, the unemployed and their champions would, it is assumed, express their resentment in votes against the Republican state ticket. This is headed by Attorney General William A. Schnader, Governor Pinchot's candidate. Should the Legislature make the appropriations. Democrats say, it would also have to levy unpopular taxes to provide the funds.

Move Attributed to Farley

The forcing of Governor Pinchot's hand after almost five months is attributed by Democratic leaders to the influence of Postmaster General James A. Farley, the Democratic national chairman, and Joseph F. Guffey, the Democratic Senatorial candidate.

During these five months of unparalleled Federal indulgence Governor Pinchot championed the New Deal in a race against Senator David A. Reed for the Republican Senatorial nomination. When he was defeated, he indicated that he would run independently. This is against the desires of Mr. Guffey," the Democratic nominee, who feels that the Governor would tend to split the vote with him and perhaps enable Senator Reed thereby to slip through to a re-election.

The time limit for Governor Pinchot to file as an independent candidate for Senator is next Friday. It has been felt that his decision would depend on the outlook just before the deadline. Democratic state leaders have protested to Washington that the outlook would depend largely on the handling of the relief problem.

Democratic Leaders Anxious

With Mr. Hopkins continuing to provide for the Pennsylvania needy, the state Democratic leaders have become increasingly anxious. The pressure on the Roosevelt administration to put the Governor, self-styled progressive Republican, on the spot has increased accordingly.

President Roosevelt began to show the effects of the pressure upon his return from Hawaii when he discouraged Governor Pinchot in a telegraphic request for a conference on the subject in Washington. Governor Pinchot came anyway, but did not see the President. The question came to an issue on Friday when the Governor invited Mr. Hopkins and the Republican and Democratic gubernatorial candidates, and some others, to meet with him at the Astor in New York to see what could be done about the situation.

George H. Earle, the Democratic candidate for Governor, declined to attend, saying it would be playing directly into Governor Pinchot's hands politically. Before declining, however, he and the other Democratic state leaders had a hurried conference which resulted in a plea to Mr. Farley to help now, if he ever was going to help. At the close of the meeting at the Astor Mr. Hopkins handed to Governor Pinchot a letter which called a halt to the practice that has been followed to date.

Text of Hopkins's Letter

Following is Mr. Hopkins's letter to Governor Pinchot:

My dear Governor: For months the Federal Emergency Relief Administration has provided most of the money for the relief of the destitute unemployed in Pennsylvania.

I have repeatedly called to your attention the necessity for Pennsylvania to carry its share of the cost of unemployment relief, and on June 30 I specifically notified you that after September 1 there would have to be a readjusemint of Federal grants, which would represent an appropriate apportionment of the cost between the state and the Federal government.

I have assured you that the Federal Emergency Relief Administration was prepared to make grants to you to discharge its full and reasonable responsibility.

These assurances I now renew. I shall make funds available to you upon evidence of action on the part of the state.

Postponing this matter until the next session of the Legislature, which I understand you to suggest, seems to me to be insufficient. I appreciate the reason which you advance for this, but the compelling interest of the unemployed requires more immediate action.

HARRY L. HOPKINS.

Hopkins Amplifies Letter

Amplifying this exposition of the Federal position, Mr. Hopkins, at Hyde Park yesterday, indicated that Governor Pinchot had yet to come to terms. He has refused to approve an additional allocation of $40,000,000 to Pennsylvania on the security of Governor Pinchot's promise that the state will reimburse Washington at the first meeting of the Legislature.

Mr. Hopkins's coolness to Governor Pinchot was indicated at the outset of the conference at the Astor in New York. As Governor Pinchot entered the room, a reporter asked him who would be present.

"Ask Mr. Hopkins," was the reply. "It's his conference."

"Oh, no," interjected Mr. Hopkins who had overheard the remark. "It's not my conference, Governor; it's your conference."

"It's our conference," corrected the Governor, smilling. "Both of us." Mr. Hopkins said nothing further.

At the close of the conference, ninety minutes later, Mr. Hopkins said in reply to questions that the calling of a session of the Legislature would be considered sufficient evidence of good faith for him to order Federal relief funds to continue flowing to Pennsylvania for the time being.

It is estimated that there are 330,000 families on relief in Pennsylvania—roughly 1,300,000 persons. In Philadelphia alone 70,000 families, numbering 300,000 persons, are on the rolls.

Although Pennsylvania is traditionally a Republican stronghold, it came close to going for President Roosevelt in 1932, and it did elect twelve Democrats to Congress in the sweep that year. Democrats have professed confidence that the trend would continue this year and help elect Mr. Guffey over Senator Reed.

President Roosevelt considers Senator Reed a typical Republican repudiation of the New Deal. Recent indications have been that Senator Reed would be re-elected.

Mrs. Pinchot May Run.

Cornelia Bryce Pinchot, wife of Governor Gifford Pinchot, said she had been asked to run for Governor in November as an independent candidate but declined to discuss the possibility of her candidacy and further.

Mrs. Pinchot merely admitted "I have been asked to run" when pressed with questions growing out of revived rumors that she would take the field against the Republican and Democratic nominees, Attorney General William A. Schnader and George H. Earle.

Mrs. Pinchot in 1928 and in 1932 ran for the United States House of Representatives in the 15th district but both times Representative Louis T. McFadden defeated her. Last spring she was mentioned as a possible candidate for the Republican nomination in that district while her name was linked, too, with the governorship race and the senatorial battle which her Governor-husband entered and lost to Senator David A. Reed.

Haruko's sympathy for Minami continues. She finally consents to Minami's proposal of marriage. They seek Tomiko's (Haruko's elder sister) permission to marry, but she objects because Minami has no visible means of supporting a family. Tomiko strongly urges Minami to attain success before considering marriage.

Minami is disapopntied and mysteriously disappears. At the same time Haruko also disappears. By a coincidence Minami and Haruko happened to be on the same coastal steamer and are brought back by Miko.

West Is Eager To Provide Age With Comfort

Interest In Pension Plans Quickens, Especially In Southern California

An active public interest in old-age pensions has continued to expand here with almost unbelievable rapidity, its zeal fed by social unrest and a considerable degree of economic distress, according to a Los Angeles dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

Beginning last summer in Long Beach, the movement swept to enormous popularity in southern California cities, spread northward, and then finally rolled over into near-by states. In its wake there have been left several vigorous organizations and a generous press supporting old-age pensions either in plan or purpose.

One of the immediate effects of so much interest has been a public officialdom convinced that its constituency demands some form of social security for its older members. With his ear to the ground, practically every candidate in the California gubernatorial primaries had something to say for old-age pensions.

Goes Back to Old Days

The current movement has its roots sunk deeper into the fiber of southern California than the casual observer would suspect. It really started years ago when middle western farmers began to drift west, not to participate in building a new empire, but to retire to a comfortable California bungalow or an apartment in Long Beach.

A great many had built a wealthy rural area. Seeing an opportunity to enjoy their fortune, they sold the farms, placed their money in mortgages and savings banks back home, and came west to live in modest security.

Then came the great deflation of the 20's, during which farm values declined substantially far in advance of 1929. Hundreds of new California residents lost heavily, but were able to scrimp along until the crisis of 1929 and 1930 added the last straw of adversity.

Today, thousands of these once comfortable families have been reduced to the level of public dependents either through complete loss of their capital or because of a disappearing income. Stranded in communities offering little immediate economic opportunity, they scan the horizen for a way out.

Two Plans Proposed

With the promise of a secured income, old-age pensions, therefore, have a glittering attraction both for elderly dependents and for the youngsters who in many cases are supporting them. For example, take the Townsend old-age revolving pensions plan, proposed by Dr. F. E. Townsend of Long Beach, which was first on the ground and has been widely indorsed. It proposes:

To pay from a fund, advanced in the first instance by the Federal Government, $200 a month to all applying American citizens over 60 years, and free from felony convictions. The money would have to be spent within the United States during the month for which it was paid, and the fund would be replenished by means of a general retail sales tax.

Based upon the same general plan, the National Pension League, with headquarters at 437 South Hill Street, has come forward with the proposal that everyone upon reaching age 55, providing they cease to engage in any occupation for profit, be retired on a monthly pension of $125 a month.

The National Pension plan also has qualifications dealing with criminal conduct, and would require a residence of 15 years in the United States. It would be supported by a gross transactions tax.

Both programs have been given vigorous promotion by the sponsors, especially the Townsend plan, and each has made an outline for securing congressional action next winter.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Marooned Man

Karlsson of Moskenö Island, one of the Lofoten group off the coast of Norway, was hunting for seals in May 1909 when rowing out to a distant cliff in the Arctic. Landing there he forgot to make his rowboat fast to the rock. The boat drifted away leaving Karlsson stranded on the barren cliff. When the rowboat was eventually found drifting by fellow fishermen, they believed the lost man had perished and his property was in due course distributed among his next of kin.

On August 15th, a boat accidentally approached Karlsson's cliff and discovered the unfortunate castaway who, without a word, fell to devoring the food offered him. Karlsson was terribly emaciated and barely able to stand erect. Before he fell into a prolonged fever, he told his rescuer that he had subsisted on nothing but moss and snow which he found in the crevices of the rock. He recovered and survived his harrowing experience by about 20 years.

A Charmed Life

A little more than two years ago Pedro Correa of Big Spring, Texas, was attacked by a Texas bad man, Ysidoro Cruz, and was shot through the head with a 32 automatic. The bullet entered his forehead above and between the eyebrow, coursing straight through his head and coming out in the back of his skull just above the neck. Yet he was not even knocked down and suffered no ill effects whatever.

The facts of the case are verified by the records of the Big Springs District Court, where Cruz was tried for attempt to murder, and the medical facts are supported by the testimony of Doctors Hall and Bennet of the same city.

Four Nations Hold Fete At Niagara

U.S., Britain, France, Canada Commemorate 117 Years Of Peace On Border

The four-day, four-nation celebration commemorating 117 years of peace along the Canadian-American frontier as contrasted to the two centuries of warfare that preceded it will take place at Hyde Park, beginning Sept. 3, says the New York Herald Tribune. Official representatives of Great Britain, France, Canada and the United States will participate in ceremonies each afternoon, and each evening in the stadium which seats 15,000. The pageant drama of old Fort Niagara will be enacted.

William Phillips, Acting Secretary of State, will represent the United States. Sir Gerald Campbell, Consul General at New York, will represent Great Britain; P. E. Flandin, Minister of Public Works, France, and Robert J. Manion, Minister of Railways and Canals, Canada.

Others who will be present are George H. Dern, United States Secretary of war; Governor Herbert H. Lehman of New York; John Collier, United States Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Senator Royal S. Copeland of New York; Colonel Donald M. Sutherland, Canadian Minister of National Defense; Warren Delano Robbins, United States Minister to Canada; Admiral Sir Roger Keyes, of the British Navy, and M. William Bray, Lieutenant Governor of New York.

Fort Niagara, restored after seven years of labor at a cost of $500,000, will be dedicated on Monday. A memorial bowider will be unveiled on Tuesday in honor of Rene Robert Cavelier de la Salle, the original builder of Fort Niagara. A monument to the Rush-Bagot Treaty, under which the Halifax-to-Vancouver border has remained unfortified since 1817, will be unveiled Thursday on the parapet of the fort. The pageant drama, which will take place nightly, will have a cast of 3,000 in period costumes, including 300 full-blooded Indians, 400 United States troops, 450 dancing girls and 500 choristers. They will re-enact upon the 280-foot stage the battles and most significant events from the fort's annals three centuries under three flags.

The ceremonies will be concluded on Thursday, after a dinner at the Hotel Niagara and a concert by the United States Army Band, conducted by Captain William J. Stannard, with the final presentation of the pageant drama and, at 11:30 p. m., a special illumination of Niagara Falls.

"The world," he said, "may be sympathetic to the National Socialist system or not but one thing it must recognize: The results of this system of government in our country are such that when the present world crisis is taken into consideration, it would appear desirable not summarily to reject our form of government but at least to examine it.

Nazis Drilling Saar Voters, League Finds

16,000 Trained By Hitler Under Cover Of Labor Camps, Says High Commissioner

Germany is maintaining a Voluntary Labor Service unit of 16,000 men recruited from the Saar and trained in the Reich, a semi-military detachment comparable to the former Austrian Nazi legion stationed at Munich, it was revealed on Sept. 1 in Geneva with publication of a report by Colonel Geoffrey G. Knox, high commissioner of the League of Nations governing body for the Saar.

The existence of this military unit has made the Saar governing commission fearful that the Nazis might attempt a coup d'etat in the rich mining region, whose inhabitants will hold a plebiscite on January 13 to decide whether they wish to return to Germany, become a part of, or continue the present semi-autonomous League government, says a dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune from Geneva.

Neutral Police Requested

The gravity of the situation was called to the attention of the council of the league by Colonel Knox, who submitted in support of his charges enclosures from official correspondence which the governing commission had seized. He repeated his appeal that the council authorize him to enroll a neutral police force to keep order in the Saar pending the plebiscite, adding that action is imperative.

"Meanwhile," his report said, "the government commission feels bound, as a preliminary and preventive measure in view of grave and menacing circumstances, to prepare a draft ordinance banning the Voluntary Labor Organization in the Saar and compelling the young men enrolled in it, and also all of them who were members of the former S. A. (Sturm Abteilungen, or Nazi storm Troops) and S. S. (Schultz Staffel, Nazi special Guard) section to report to the police, with the possibility of being placed under special surveillance."

The High Commissioner appended first a letter of the central Voluntary Labor Service organization, dated October 6, 1933, in which the German government was asked to make provisions for 10,000 Saar Germans in the Voluntary Labor Service.

Versailles Treaty Circumvented

"We suggest" this letter said, "that these young men should be divided into campaign groups and quartered east of the 50 kilometer zone east of the Rhine (a strip ordered demilitarized forever by the Treaty of Versailles) and west of general line through Settin, Frankfort-am-Oder and Dresden; and that, in addition to the ordinary service prescribed for the Voluntary Labor Service, they should receive special attention and instruction with view to the Sarr campaign."

After quoting more recent documents to show that this plan has been carried out by Germany at an expenditure of 12,900,000 marks ($5,160,000), Colonel Knox added:

"The inevitable conclusion to be drawn from the passages quoted above is that the geographic position of the special training camps for young Saarlanders with a view to the Saar campaign is chosen so as to enable these young men to be given military training without infringement of Articles 42 and 43 of the Treaty of Versailles (the articles demilitarizing the Rhine)."

The High Commissioner said he had reliable information that the special unit numbered 16,000 youths, instead of 10,000, as indicated in the official correspondence. Other efforts by German agencies to influence the Saar campaign, including resort to pressure and acts which had disorganized the governing commission's work, were described with documentary proof.

Colonel Knox added to the special letter and its documents his own quarterly report as High Commissioner, in which he said that the governing body, among other things, was determined to protect Jews in the Saar against discrimination.

The head of the League commission is known to be deeply concerned over the Saar situation because of the Council's delay in setting up the special neutral police which he has asked to insulate the Saarlanders against Nazi coercion.

Anne Lindberghh Writes Secrets Of World Flight

like snow, but dirty and streaked as though raked by snowplows.

"We very quickly passed this crevassed area and were flying over clean white snow and occasional ice-blue pools. They must have been lakes, but, as we were flying high and there was no object of comparison to give any idea of size, they looked like small pools to me.

"It began to be rather cold, although the temperature was never lower than 13 below centigrade, and this at an altitude of 13,000 feet.

"I was wearing, in addition to woollen underwear, one thin wool shirt, one thick wool shirt, one wool sweater, wool riding trousers, several pairs of wool stockings, furlined kamiks and helmet, and over everything the hooded white blanket parka designed for us by Dr. Stefansson. I was quite warm except for my feet, which I put another pair of mittens. A third pair would have been very comfortable but would have made my fingers too bulky to handle the radio key."

Two Difficulties of Flight

Two situations during the long trip that called for more than usual flying skill were the landing of the heavy pontoon-fitted plane at Moscow and the take-off from Bathurst, Africa, Mrs. Lindbergh writes.

"The river (at Moscow) was quite narrow and wound through the heart of the city," she says. "We were to land in a rather short stretch of water between two bridges. I wondered if we could 'make it,' and just what would happen if we didn't. After circling low over the river several times, we skimmed over the top of the first bridge, side-slipped steeply down to the water, straightened out and landed with plenty of room ahead."

Repeated efforts were made to get the plane into the air from the harbor or Bathurst without success.

"'What is the matter,' asked a friend who had kindly stayed 'to watch us?" writes Mrs. Lindbergh.

"'Overload, that's all,' answered my husband. 'We've taken off with that much before (in Greenland). But it's different down here in the tropics; different air.'

"We drove home through the dark streets in silence and went to bed very tired after our long unsuccessful day.

"A Few More Tricks To Try"

"'We still have a few tricks to try,' said my husband.

"I wondered what they were.

"My husband spent the next day inside the plane, cutting out an unused gasoline tank, piece by piece, with tin snips. He was tired at the end of the day, but much more cheerful at the thought of the saved weight.

"By the next evening we had cut out even more weight; some emergency chocolate (there was still enough food and water left for a month); the anchor; the rope; the tin bucket; a great many tools; the flying suits; the sleeping bag; all our clothes, except the ones we wore; our duffel bags, and many other things— a total of about 150 pounds."

Then the ship rose and started westward on its sixteen-hour hop to Brazil.

During that flight Mrs. Lindbergh had one of her most thrilling radio experiences, when a station at Chatham, Mass., communicated directly and asked for "the first radio interview from an airplane."

The answer which Mrs. Lindbergh rapped out was: "Sorry, to busy here—must get weather—from PVJ."

"No matter how thrilling a contact with Catham, Mass., might be," she explains, 'we certainly had enough to do without giving interviews."

Foreword by Husband

The opinion that any of the transatlantic routes can be flown "regularly" is expressed by Colonel Lindbergh himself in The National Geographic Magazine in a foreword to Mrs. Lindbergh's detailed story.

"It is no longer a questoin of whether it is possible to operate an airline across the Atlantic," Colonel Lindbergh says. "Rather, it is a question of which route can be known now, and in the future, with the highest degree of efficiency."

Prince Of Wales To Be Best Man In December

He Will Take Part In Marriage Ceremony Of His Brother Late In The Fall

With the Prince of Wales as the best man and the Dukes of York and Gloucester as bridesgroomsmen, Prince George of Great Britain and Princess Marina of Greece will be married in November or December in Westminster Abbey, says a London dispatch to the New York Times on August 29. The ceremony will be performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of London, Winchester and Oxford.

There will be a state procession along the Mall, and afterward the bride and bridegroom will return to Buckingham Palace for a wedding breakfast. About a thousand guests will be invited to the wedding, including the former King and Queen of Greece, the former King and Queen of Spain, probably Queen Maud of Norway, who is Princess Royal of Great Britain, and King Christian of Denmark.

Going to England

Princess Marina is expected to come to England shortly with Prince George to see King George and Queen Mary, and then to rejoin her parents, Prince and Princess Nicolas of Greece, and prepare her trousseau. Princess Marina will not return to London again until a few days before the wedding.

The royal yacht Victoria and Albert probably will be sent to bring Prince George and the Princess across the English Channel from Calais. They will be welcomed by a royal salute from Dover Castle.

Congratulations poured in all day long at Balmoral Castle, Scotland, where the King and Queen are staying, and at York House, St. James's Palace. Congratulations were sent to Prince George by the Duke and Duchess of York from Scotland and by the Duke of Gloucester. At Balmoral Castle the telephone rang continuously.

Naturally the news of the engagement took precedence over everything else in the newspapers here and it was a general topic of conversation everywhere, not least among the Prince's many friends.

"Prince George has always been considered the 'ladies' man' of the royal family," says The Evening Star. "How many girls he has been attentive to, his favorite brother, the Prince of Wales, may have some idea of. How many girls have been in love with him must be a figure more difficult to estimate."

Princess Tells of Elation

When interviewed in Salzburg by telephone from London Princess Marina said:

"I cannot tell you how happy I am. I hope we shall be married in London."

The manager of the Salzburg hotel, where the Prince and Princess were staying, said he never saw such a happy couple.

"The Prince was humming a little song to himself when he greeted his fiancee this morning before breakfast," he said. "The Princess was radiant. It was noticed yesterday that the Princess was wearing an engagement ring. So interested were the people of Salzburg in the royal romance that a rumor was started yesterday that the Princess and Prince were already married, but that, of course, was ridiculous."

The Infanta Eulalie of Spain, who has known Princess Marina for some years, said of her in Paris today:

"She is the most beautiful Princess in Europe. There is no doubt about it being a love match, because she is so beautiful that any man would fall in love with her easily."

It is said that none of the pictuers of the Princess does her justice.

Prince May Become Duke

LONDON, Aug. 29.—A dukedom may be King George's wedding present to his youngest son, Prince George, whose engagement the King announced from Balmoral Castle in Scotland with all signs of paternal pride and joy. At present not a peer of the realm, Prince George may become either Duke of Kent or Duke of Edinburgh.

For his wedding, Prince George will receive no ordinary license. The imposing document will be nearly one yard square and will consist of four pages lettered in red and black ink. The cost of the license will be £50, but Prince George will not need to dig into the £10,000 annuity he now receives to pay for it. The bill will be taken care of by the British treasury.

Hair in the Palm of His Hand

Roy Deason of Ecorse, Michigan, had an unfortunate accident that resulted in a queer growth of hair that seems impossible—hair in the palm of his hand. Deason was employed in the mill of the Michigan Steel Corporation, July 11, 1933, and in the course of his work his hand was caught in a machine in such a peculiar manner that he lost one finger and all the flesh from the palm of his hand. Doctors of the Michigan Mutual Hospital found it necessary to graft flesh from his abdomen, and in so doing grafted a piece with a growth of hair that has continued to grow. So, contrary to the old adage, Deason proudly proves that hair can grow in the palm of the hand.

his will's $5,000.

When the charge against Miss Comforti was read she looked a bit puzzled and asked: "Why am I charged with harboring Dillinger? I only saw the man twice."

Commissioner Walker suavely passed that off with a remark that he would consider her statement a plea of not guilty. The girl tried to engage Samuel P. Cowley, first assistant to Melvin H. Purvis, local chief of the Division of Investigation, in conversation, but Cowley indicated he had never been properly introduced and so wouldn't speak to her. Her bond was set at $5,000.

Piquett Often Under Fire

Dillinger and Van Meter were operated on last May 27, with Loeser, it was charged, acting as chief surgeon, in the home of James J. Probasco. Probasco leaped to his death from the nineteenth floor window of Purvis's Loop office while being questioed a few days after Dillinger had been slain. The consensus today was that Probasco had implicated the others held in today's arraignment.

Purvis said that J. Edgar Hoover, head of the Division of Investigation, had been in Chicago for several days directing the operations of the unit, and that he had left Chicago last night when satisfied that all was well in hand.

Piquett, who was City Prosecutor during the second term of former Mayor William Hale Thompson, has been the target for charges on several occasions—in 1919 that he had aided gambling in a Chicago River ward and transferred policemen who wouldn't heed him, and in 1922 that he had participated in coal buying graft at the time of the Chicago School Board graft scandal. The first charges never came to a head. On the second he was freed on a technicality.

When the prisoners were lodged in the county jail the warden received orders from Federal men that Piquett should not be allowed to communicate with the others.

2 Big Questions Posed In Paris

Visitors Ask Whether War Is Coming, When France Will Go Off Gold

American visitors in Paris this Summer have been asking two questions: Is there going to be war? and when will the franc go off gold? Thus writes Mr. P. J. Philip from Paris in the New York Times.

In the way the questions were put there was already a subtle difference. The first was frankly interrogative and usually the answer was listened to. Only a very small percentage of those who came seeking another opinion or wanting an occasion to express their own seemed to regard war as inevitable.

In fact, recently they have been inclined to believe readily that there has been a great deal more noise than reality about this constant scare of war in Europe and have come to see that the whole Continent is far too sick to think of getting out of bed to fight.

But with the question regarding the future of the franc it was different. Without exception these inquirers have been convinced in their own minds that the franc must go off gold and that it was only a question of time. Most of them have been living for eighteen months in expectation of being able to say, "I told you so," and they have become almost impatient with the franc and the French for not having long ago justified their prediction.

"Next Month" a Long Time

There are even visitors who volunteer confidential information that they have it from a most authoritative source that the devaluation of the franc is scheduled for next month. It has been next month for many long months for those who have to live here on depreciated dollars.

For any correspondent who is supposed to know the answers these two questions are always embarrassing, and the best formula of answer which has been found is to reply with two other questions: Would the United States lend any more money to Europe for the prosecution of a war? And if the franc goes off gold, what will be the dollar policy of the United States?

Those two counter-questions are, however, only defensive. When a real answer must be given, it is best to draw the visitor's attention to two established facts within his own power of control. The first is that if he speaks and reads French he will find among the French people and in the press a far saner judgment of events and much less nervousness than there were a year and even six months ago.

This change of attitude has, of cource, many causes, but its principal one is the conviction that even though Germany may have rearmed far beyond the limits prescribed in the Treaty of Versailles, she has not the necessary economic and financial weapons for war and is not likely to have them for a considerable time.

Proposals To Revise Covenant Meets Protests

state.

The Council shall recommend the use of armed force, to which the members of the League shall contribute. The members shall support and assist each other. Non-members shall be invited to accept membership for a particular purpose under this head.

We know that these provisions have not been effective. They might well be reconsidered.

Treaty Registration

Treaties are to be registered with the League—and even the United States has seen the advantage of centralizing the registration of international treaties. Whether the League has been right in accepting the registration of various treaties of alliance which are inconsistent with the Convenant (Article 20) may be properly questioned. There are today, in my opinion, international engagements which are totally incompatible with the League idea, though Article 21 admits the validity of regional understandings.

I have already referred to Article 19, under which treaties may be revised. It is vehemently denounced as virtually a dead letter by the status quo nations.

The mandatory system, by which the League takes the responsibility for the good administration of various non-European territories, which are confided to the care of different powers, is defined. The League is given control or supervision over various labor matters, the treatment of native races, the drug traffic, communications and transit, and so forth.

To say that the Covenant shall not be amended is nonsense. It has been amended. The procedure is fairly difficult and long, but it is provided for in the Covenant itself, and no changes can be ruled out a priori. It is neither logical nor legal to affirm that the Covenant is as the law of the Medes and Persians.

What would be strange, indeed, would be an assumption of infallibility in a document which was drawn up without adequate precedents, in conditions of turmoil and of contradictory sentiments, with mixed motives and false conceptions of the possibilities and of the desirabilities. Like all human charters, the Covenant must be subject to change.

States' Rights Issues In Spanish Republic

local autonomy they had under the monarchy or have gained since the advent of the republic.

None of the Center or Right Wing political parties controlling the national government looks with disfavor on regional autonomy or any province's desire to preserve its distinctive culture. Only a few monarchist Deputies and the Royalist press fulminate against Basque and Catalan "treason" and demand severe punishment for "traitorous" politicians.

The conservative Catholic party favors as much regional autonomy as the Constitution provides for but is committed to the patriotic ideal of a united Spain.

Left leaders, including former Premier Manuel Azana and the Socialist former Minister Andalccio Prieto, have rushed to Catalonia and the Basque country whenever they thought their moral support for the autonomy cause was needed. The Leftists take all the credit for the republican Constitution's provisions for regional autonomy, but the truth is the Right Wing gives equal support to this principle. The Catalan Liga, or Rightist party, is as strongly autonomist as the Esquerra, or Leftist group. But the Leftists lost the last national election, and they will participate in any controversy which might impair their rights or popularity or undermine their authority in Madrid.

The Basque provinces have not yet obtained a regional autonomy statute like Catalonia's, but the Madrid government has repeatedly indicated its willingness to give them one. It is only necessary for the Basques to assemble in a constitutional convention to draw up their statute and submit it to the Cortes. If the statute does not conflict with the national Constitution it is certain the Madrid Parliament will approve it.

Galicia and the Province of Valencia have their autonomy movements too, but they have not developed as in Catalonia and in the Basque country, probably because of the absence of much local enthusiasm. Andalusia, Estremadura and Aragono show virtually no interest in autonomy and have never keenly desired as much independence from Madrid as the Catalans and the Basques.

The Basque language is totally unlike the Castilian, which is more than the Catalonians, the Valencianos or the Gallegos can claim for the tongues they speak. In fact, the origin of the Basque race and language is unknown. It is even suggested the Basques may be survivors of the lost continent of Atlantis.

However, the same Spanish that is spoken in Castile is read and heard in Andalusia, Estremadura and Aragon with only slight differences in accent. Perhaps Galicia, Valencia and Andalusia are not greatly concerned about the danger of having their regional individuality crushed under the Castilian heel because their provinces are well represented in the national government. Besides many Deputies representing these three provinces in the Cortes, President Niceto Alcala Zamora is an Andalusian, Premier Ricardo Samper is a Valenicano, Foreign Minister Plta Romero is a Gallego, and Finance Minister Manuel Marraco is from Aragon.

Hungary Worried On Italian Policy

Fears Czechoslovakia Will Get Mussolini To Drop Stand For Treaty Revision

News that Edouard Benes, Czechoslovak Foreign Minister, probably would visit Italy has alarmed Hungary, which fears she may be forced to "pay the costs," as he had said he does not wish to return from Rome empty handed, says Emil Vadney in a Budapest dispatch to the New York Times.

For the first time since the conclusion of the Italo-Hungarian alliance, the Italian press has been critical of treaty revision demands in general. But as Hungary's foreign policy is based on the demand for revision of the treaty of Trianon, even the smallest change in Italian policy over revision is a severe blow for Italo-Hungarian friendship.

Official Hungary consider the sudden change by Italy as due to Czechoslovak intrigue to separate Rome and Budapest by promising Premier Mussolini that the Little Entente will join Italy's Central European scheme upon the condition that Italy cease to support Hungarian revisionism and will unitedly oppose restoration of the Hapsburg dynasty.

Hope Is Maintained

Governmental circles are hopeful that D. Benes will not be able to fulfil these promises, especially as far as Yugoslavia and Rumania are concerned, and that Premier Mussolini will prefer to stand with Hungary, who has proved her sincere friendship for Italy for the last seven years.

Opponents of the foreign policy of the present Hungarian regime, however—especially the Hungarian royalists—are bitter in condemning the "Germanophile" policy of Premier Goemboes and Foreign Minister Kanya. They point out that, by manifesting pro-Nazi tendencies, the government deeply disappointed Premier Mussolini when his relations with Berlin became tense on account of the Austrian question.

When Italian troops were concentrated on the Austro-Italian frontier to prevent an invasion of Austria by the Nazis, the Hungarian official press, the legitimists contend, emphasized pro-Nazi reports. The official newspaper Pester Lloyd recently carried a particle ridiculing the present Austrian regime.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Two-Headed Live Cow

This animal wonder, normal in every respect except for the double head, was exhibited in New York and examined by many incredulous naturalists. Its body was well developed and it was perfect in the performance of every bodily function. The second head, growing out of a lateral depression in its cranium, was regularly developed with eyes, horns, nostrils, mouth and all. It was never seen to take nourishment with its other mouth, but it apparently used the duplicate to chew the cud. Head number two was also deficient in the development of the cerebrum. It lived for 8 years, and was fierce and robust while alive.

CHECK UP THESE IMPORTANT POINTS BEFORE YOU BUY AN AUTOMOBILE....

DON'T take anybody's word for it, but do your own investigating. It's your money you are spending and you want to get the most for that money. Find out what's under the hood and then ride in the car. It's worth real money to you to get all the facts and make sure of the best choice. Here are some important facts about the New Ford V-8 for 1934.

ENGINE DESIGN—Don't be satisfied with less than eight cylinders when you buy a motor car. The day is here when anything less than an eight is out-of-date. The V-8 design has been used for years in the finest cars and its use is a sign of quality. The Ford is the only car selling under $2500 that brings you a V-type eight-cylinder engine. This fact alone is an important reason for buying. For the engine is the heart of the car.

SPEED—The New Ford V-8 has more speed than any other low-price car. This means more than the ability to go fast. The ability to do over 85 miles an hour means unusually smooth performance, without strain, at 50, 55 and 60. A car must be built right all the way through to be able to run over 80 miles an hour.

ACCELERATION—Watch the New Ford V-8 at the next traffic light and you'll get a line on its remarkable acceleration. Few cars at any price can beat it on the gateway.

SMOOTHNESS—Ride in the New Ford V-8 for 1934 and you get a new idea of engine smoothness. No vibration. No effort at any speed. Its quiet performance puts a lot more enjoyment in motoring.

ECONOMY—No car at any price costs so little to own and run as the New Ford V-8. It is economical on gasoline and oil and you save many dollars because of freedom from repairs, low cost of parts and service, long life and high resale value.

No Ford ever built—not even the famous Model T—is so economical from every angle as this New Ford V-8 for 1934. The New Dual Carburetion gives more than 2½ miles per gallon and tests show 20 miles per gallon at 45 miles an hour. We challenge any car to beat that.

SAFETY—Don't overlook this important factor in selecting a motor car. By all means, buy a car that has an all-steel body. Wood is all right for boxes and furniture but not for high-speed automobiles. And remember this—the New Ford V-8 has unusually effective brakes. It has more braking surface per pound of weight than any other car. All New Ford V-8 cars have a safety-glass windshield. All De Luxe cars have safety glass throughout without additional cost.

EASE OF CONTROL—Another Ford safety factor—another reason why it is such a satisfactory car to drive. Easy gear shifting—easier steering because of the new 15-to-1 steering gear ratio.

HILL CLIMBING—Here's another place where you can see the superiority of the Ford V-8. It will take almost any hill in high faster, easier, more safely than any other car on the road.

COMFORT—Again we say—"Ride in the New Ford V-8 and see for yourself." We tell you now that you are going to be amazed at the riding comfort of this car. Increased spring flexibility, newly designed spring leaves, improved shock absorbers, deeper seat cushions and softer seat springs make a tremendous difference.

APPEARANCE—The New Ford V-8 is one of the best-looking cars on the road, bar none. It is distinctly modern in lines, sturdy and substantial. Fenders on all De Luxe cars are the same color as the body. Body and fenders are finished in a beautiful lacquer of remarkable luster and endurance.

INTERIOR ROOM—The seating in the New Ford V-8 is designed to carry people of all widths and heights in absolute comfort. There is room and to spare for long-legged folks. Tall folks will find plenty of head room. Wide people will find uncrowded comfort for three on the rear seat. All seats are broad and deep and soft.

Enrollment figures for the School of Japanese language and Culture which re-opened at the city Y.M.C.A. last Tuesday, were announced today by Mr. Mazuya Matsumiya, executive secretary.

There are 17 full time language students, 10 special students, 6 who are studying outside the school but who live here and who follow the curriculum, 10 in the branch schools of Yokohama and Fukuoka, 30 in the extension department and 16 in the section for foreign born Japanese.

At the opening exercises last week, Dr. Gilbert Bowles, acting director, explained the history and organization of the school and Mr. Yahei Matsumiya discussed the three fundamental principles of the school's policy—small classes with the largest possible opportunity for personal attention by the teachers; thorough and repeated drill in the pronunciation of words and carefully selected graded sentences, and teaching and learning the meaning of Japanese words through objects, actions, and thought associations without the medium of translation.

Chaco War End Seen As Distant

Bolivia's Demand For River Port Hampers Present Peace Negotiations

The only war going on in the world bids fair to continue its sanguinary course indefinitely. Another effort to bring peace to the warring factions in the desert of the Gran Chaco is likely to end in failure, although official announcements to that effect are withheld, according to Mr. Harold B. Hinton's Washington dispatch to the New York Times on September 8.

When the Bolivian Government attached conditions to the Argentine offer for arbitration, which the Paraguayans had accepted without reservations, observers here concluded that no end to the war was in sight. The Bolivian Foreign Ministry apparently based its refusal to accept unconditional arbitration on the advice of the generals commanding in the field. These strategists believe that the Paraguayan forces are extended much too far beyond their bases and that the advent of the rainy season in another month or six weeks will force their withdrawal from the favorable positions they now occupy.

Bolivia Demands a Port

On the strength of this analysis, a conditional acceptance of the Argentine proposal was offered, but it was couched in terms tantamount to a refusal. The Bolivians demanded that, as a preliminary to arbitration, there be guaranteed to them a port on the Paraguay River. They also specified that the arbitration limit itself to a relatively small slice of the Gran Chaco, bordering closely on Paraguay proper.

It is understood that the zone the Bolivians are willing to arbitrate is a rough square bordered by the Paraguay and Pilcomayo Rivers, by the twenty-first parallel on the north and by the meridian of 59 degrees 55 minutes on the west. The Paraguayan troops already have expelled their adversaries from this area and have pushed them almost to the Bolivian border at one point.

This latest conciliation attempt was fostered by Carlos Saavedra Lamas, the Argentine Foreign Minister and one of the leading candidates for the Nobel Peace Prize. His proposal was offered with the sympathy and blessing of the United States Government, which has supported and will support all efforts to bring the war to an end. The Brazilian Government also associated itself with the proposal, but it was regarded principally as an initiative of the Argentine statesman, the author of the anti-War pact to which the Chaco war offers a glaring inconsistency.

Communications Constructed

The Bolivian General Staff may have overlooked the superior communications which the Paraguayans have built into the portion of the Chaco which they have conquered. When the Bolivian Army was in its furthest extended position, at the outbreak of hostilities in June, 1932, it had not built up adequate channels of supply to its own rear. It relied upon provisioning its troops from the Argentine territory adjacent to the battlefront.

When the Argentine frontier was closed by a proclamation of neutrality, the Bolivians had to withdraw to a position nearer their own country. The Paraguayans profited by that initial mistake, strategically speaking, and have constructed 200 kilometers of railroad toward the front lines.

From the end of the railroad the Paraguayans have built supply roads in all indicated directions, and these roads will stand the test of the wet weather to come, their engineers believe.

This government, while obviously desirous of promoting peace between the warring countries, has had to chart a cautious course to avoid being accused of favoring one side or the other. Such charges have been made by the belligerents as a matter of course, but on the whole the South American countries seem to have credited our disinterested motives.

Bolivia Protested Embargo

One of the latest accusations of partiality came from the Bolivian side. In an outspoken note Dr. Enrique Finot, the Bolivian Minister here, informed the State Department that his government regarded the arms embargo declared by President Roosevelt against both sides as operating distinctly in favor of Paraguay. The Paraguayans protested against the State Department's decision to permit the shipment of war munitions ordered and paid for before the declaration of the embargo. By this decision Bolivia obtained one final shipment of needed war supplies.

At the Pan-American Conference in Montevideo nearly a year ago Secretary of State Hull associated himself actively with an unofficial committee of Foreign Ministers, over which President Gabriel Terra of Uruguay presided. This committee tried every possible device to end the war and was successful in effecting a temporary armistice pending submission of the report of the conciliation committee of the League of Nations.

Hostilities were started again soon after the first of the year, however, and have continued ever since. The principal contribution of the United States toward peace in the Chaco was the declaration of the arms embargo recently. This country was followed in the move by all the principal arms-producing countries of the world except Japan, whose officials gave private assurances that no arms would be exported to either side.

The Japanese Government apparently felt that it could not be officially associated with any measure so closely allied with the League of Nations. The impression here is that the world-wide embargo is in full effect and that both sides will, in course of time, be compelled to restrict their operations greatly from lack of materials, even if no peace move should succeed.

of 3.3 centimeters in air. The beta rays of protactinium come out with energies corresponding to 350,000 volts, while the beta rays from radium have energies of 250,000 volts. The gamma radiations from pure protactinium are also more penetrating than those from pure radium.

Breaks Into Two Atoms

By natural processes, he added, the atom of protactinium breaks up by the alchemy of nature into two atoms, one of helium with atomic weight four, and one of actinium, with an atomic weight of 227. The two atomic weights total 231, which is the total atomic weight of Isotope Two of protactinium. Helium is atomic number two and actinium is atomic number 89, representing the electrical charges of the two atoms. Their total makes 91, which is the atomic number corresponding to the number of electric charges of protactinium.

The ton of waste radium ore was first reduced by a series of complicated chemical treatments until one-tenth of a gram of the oxide of the element, known as protactinium oxide, was obtained.

This oxide, which contains one atom of protactinium and five atoms of oxygen to the molecule, is a snow-white powder, with a melting point of 2,000 degree centigrade and which shines in the dark because of its radioactivity.

This oxide was then converted into a halide salt by substituting the oxygen with either chlorine, bromine or iodine. From these salts the pure metal was finally extracted by the "cracking process" devcloped by Dr. Irving Langmuir.

Metal Collects on Wire

In this "cracking-up" process the protactinium salt is placed in a highly evacuated glass bulb containing a tungsten wire. The filament is made very hot by the passage of an electric current. In this process the metal collects on the wire while the chlorine, bromine or iodine is turned into a gas and is pumped off.

The research was made possible, Dr. von Grosse said, by a personal grant from Hiram J. Halle, president of the Universal Oil Products Company, and by the assistance of Dr. Gustav Egglioff, director of research for the company. He was assisted in his work by Meyer S. Agruss of the University of Chicago.

He also gave credit to the Lindsay Light Company of Chicago, which placed at his disposal its plant for extracting different rare earth metals, and to the director of that plant, Dr. Mark Eichelberger. Lyle Borst of the University of Illinois also received credit for assistance in the setting up of the apparatus in the final stages of the work.

Dr. von Grosse was born in Riga, now Latvia, formerly Russia, Jan. 4, 1905. He was educated in Shanghai and in Germany and came to the United States in 1930. He is married and has one son, born last week, two days after the isolation of protactinium.

Mosley Gave Force To Fascism In England

times and in all countries. When a youth can play at soldiers with the genuine conviction that by so doing he is helping to save his country from Red domination, he is happy indeed.

Appeal to People

And it must be recognized that Fascism does, in however distorted a fashion, make an appeal to certain deep-rooted characteristics of the English people. Though modeled on Continental lines, the Blackshirt movement stands above all for "England for the English," and those who interpret that slogan along the lines of military, naval and air strength; the "strong hand" in India and Ireland, and even, to some extent, "Empire Free Trade," do experience a certain urge to the Fascist camp.

A bill to forbid the wearing of "political uniforms" was suggested in the House of Commons, but the Government did not take it up; and indeed it has been the experience of other nations that a "politcal uniform" is something that it is singularly difficult to define for legal purposes. A probable development is a governmental measure to give the police power to be present of their own accord at any private political meeting.

In any event, it seems likely that nothing will be done until the autumn Parliamentary session when representatives from all parties are expected to accept an invitation from the Home Secretary, Sir John Gilmour, and debate with him on the entire problem.

12 Jurors Will Act On An 11-Inch Fish

Angler Plans To Fight State's Contention That Pickerel Can't Shrink An Inch

The sad-eyed pickerel that Emill Schoor caught in Cross River Reservoir in Bedford Hills, N. Y., on Aug. 25 still rested on a cake of ice in police headquarters in Bedford tonight, withheld from piscatorial Valhalla by the slowgrinding gears of the law, says an article dated Sept. 7, in the New York Times.

Release seemed at hand this morning when C. M. Breder, Jr. assistant director of the New York Aquarium, contended in Bedford Town Court, in behalf of the State, that a pickerel cannot shrink a full inch, as Schoor says his did.

But tonight Thomas J. O'Connor of White Plains, counsel for Schoor, announced that he would not accept the State's contention as final.

"I was ready to let this case drop," he said, "rather than waste the time of twelve good men listening to all the evidence, but now that the impression has gone out that we ran for cover on the issue, we're going to prove that a pickerel can shrink a full inch."

On Ice for Two Weeks

The lachrymose pickerel that Schoor hauled out of the reservoir two weeks ago—and it was his only catch for the day—was, according to his contention, a full twelve inches, which is just legal size. By the time the game wardens came, four hours later, it was only eleven inches long.

On Sept. 1 the case came before Justice of the Peace J. Franklin Ryan. Schoor stuck to his story and gained country-wide fame as the only angler who ever boasted about the puny size of his catch. His lawyer got an adjournment and the fish went into the police ice box.

When the case came up again today Robert P. Boyer, Deputy Attorney General, was ready, with Mr. Breder to uphold the State's contention that pickerel do not shrink—much. But Mr. O'Connor was busy and telephoned that his client was ready to pay the $12.50 demanded by the court.

Nevertheless, Justice Ryan had Mr. Breader give his opinion in open court.

When Mr. O'Connor picked up the local papers tonight and read how the icthyologist had demonstrated with an embalmed pickerel that the structure of the fish's spine permits of no greater shrinkage than one-quarter of an inch, he was indignant.

"There was no necessity for having Mr. Breder go through all that," he said. "It only served to create the impression that my client and I had run to cover, which isn't true. If I had not been busy we'd have been in court."

Jury Trial to Be Sought

On Monday, he said, he will demand that the case go before a jury—Justice Ryan had not officially closed the case when court closed—and will ask that the thing be fought out.

"I didn't want to waste the time of twelve men on this case," he explained, "but now I'll have to, as a matter of principle, and we'll go in there prepared to prove with our own experts that a pickerel can shrink a full inch. We didn't run to cover."

He will also demand, he said, that another justice be assigned to hear the case, contending that Justice Ryan disqualified himself by his procedure today. The justice runs a garage when there are no cases to be heard.

Mr. Breder's pickerel, an Aquarium exhibit, was soused in alcohol and embalmed. It shrank one-thirty-second of an inch in three hours, he told the court, and at the end of seventeen hours another one-thirty-second of an inch. He set this as the maximum possible shrinkage.

"That's what he says," was Mr. O'Connor's comment. "Well, I have a scientist and two expert fishermen who will prove Mr. Breder is wrong."

Meanwhile the poor pickerel is marooned on the ice-cake.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Blind Auto Mechanic

The story of Fred A. Wilcox, Ripley, N. Y. garage owner, provides a paradox unequalled in the automobile industry, for in the last 12 eyars he has serviced thousands of automobiles—supplied them with gas and oil—repaired thousands of tires—adjusted carburetors—and every other auotmotive job from cleaning spark plugs to overhauling entire motors. Yet he has never seen an automobile.

When Mr. Wilcox was but a small boy, more than fifty years ago, he suffered the loss of his eyesight. With the advent of the automobile, he became interested in them and has since mastered the art of repairing the delicate motor parts purely by his sense of touch and memory of where parts belong. All his tools are carefully pigeon-holed where he can pick them up immediately, and his finished jobs are excellently done.

His simple philosophy accounts for his unequalled success in life—"Stick to it or starve."

Lafitte the Pirate

On November 24, 1813, William C. Claiborne, Governor of Louisiana, issued a proclamation offering $500 for the arrest of Jean Lafitte the pirate who, with his brother and a gang of 100 men, ran a freebooter and smuggling settlement on a group of secluded islands in Barataria Bay about 40 miles south of New Orleans. Two days later, Lafitte's proclamation appeared beside that of the Governor, offering $1500 for the arrest of Governor Claiborne.

While the Governor had to remain indoors busy with the problems of the War with England, Lafitte and his companions continued to swagger through the streets unmolested. Only a short time later however, law and order prevailed again, when Governor Claiborne obtained an indictment, with which a Federal Navy and Army force raided the Barataria settlement and arrested the privateers, who were brought to trial.

Compulsory Education Places 1,813,400 In Soviet Schools

Kenzo

MOSCOW, Aug. 1—(Rengo Mail)—Compulsory education is moving ahead so rapidly in the USSR, that by the end of 1933 there were 1,813,400 students enrolled in the schools, this being approximately three times the number registered in the pre-revolutionary period, 1914-1915.

Mass education outside the schools, i.e. literacy classes for older people, is also developing on a large scale. In carrying out universal education, special attention has been devoted to the polytechnization of the schools, this being considered imperative in view of the necessity in the Soviet Union to bridge the gap between physical and intellectual labor. A network of schools has been attatched to factories; machine-tractor stations, state and collective farms, all have their own schools where the organization of labor productivity is closely connected with theoretical education.

The table below gives a graphic picture of the development of education after the October Revolution and through the years of the first Five Year Plan, as compared with the pre-revolutionary period of 1914-1915.

Year	Number of primary and secondary schools	Number of students (in thousands) Primary	Secondary	Total
1914-15 ..	106,400	7,236	364.6	7,800.6
1920-21 ..	118,398	9,206.8	574.4	9,781.2
1928-29 ..	124,429	10,468.4	1,606.4	12,074.8
1930-31 ..	152,554	15,609.1	2,047.1	17,656.2
1932-33 ..	167,254	18,179.4	3,634.0	21,813.4

Here we can see that the increase in the number of students by the end of 1933 as compared with 1914-15 was 251.2 per cent in the elementary schools and 643.6 per cent in the secondary schools. In 1934, the total number of students in all educational institutions will reach 24.2 million.

Arms Probe Reveals Link Between Firms

Intelligence Officer of the Navy that a fleet of submarines be sent around South America as an advertisement of American goods.

Admiral Niblack, according to a letter from Mr. Chapin to Mr. Spear, thought it a fine idea, but the White House frowned on the proposal and that was the end of it.

The hearing will reconvene at 10 A. M. tomorrow.

Zaharoff Man of Mystery

Sir Basil Zaharoff is about 85 years old, looks like Cardinal Richelieu, and is a strange and silent figure. Now he is a lonely recluse, waiting for death in his home in Paris or in his villa at Monte Carlo, between which he passes most of his time, but he remains the man of mystery, about whose name legends of incredible wealth, power and intrigue have circulated for many years.

He had been called the richest man in Europe, a king-maker and the "power behind the throne" in many European and Near Eastern countries. Amassing great wealth in the manufacture and sale of armament and munitions, he is said to have played the role of private banker for more than one government in distress, notably Great Britain during the war.

He was widely known as a close friend of Lloyd George, Clemenceau, Briand and Venizelos during the days of their power.

Despite the fact that he is generally believed to have sold war munitions "on both sides of the fence" in Europe, like some Americans who have been known to make campaign contributions to both the Republican and Democratic parties in the same election, he seems to have retained the good-will of conflicting European countries.

Speaks 14 Languages Fluently

He is described as being a man of unusually keen intelligence, agreeable personality, great generosity and wide range of interests. His speaking of fourteen languages fluently was of great help to him in his days as a master salesman. Also, according to his competitors, there was a certain unscrupulousness in his methods of getting orders.

Like almost everything else in his life, mystery shrouds even the date and place of his birth, his parentage, and his citizenship. The most widely accepted theory is that he was born in 1849 in a suburb of Constantinople. He is believed to be of Greek or Greek and French parentage.

No one knows to what country he owes allegiance. He is a Knight of the Grand Cross in Great Britain, possesses the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor in France, and has similar decorations from Spain and other countries.

In 1877 he became known in Europe as a salesman for the leading Scandinavian firm of armament manufacturers. At the turn of the century he was recognized as the leading figure in European munitions, with interests in Russian, Turkish, English, French and German armament companies. When the World War started in 1914, he was said to have large interests in both Vickers, Ltd., in Great Britain and the Krupp Corporation in Germany.

Held to Favor British Policy

Despite the canny international game that he played, he was believed to favor British policy above all others, and to have a sentimental feeling for Greece. It was charged in the House of Commons that he was responsible for Lloyd George's pro-Greek policy in the Greco-Turkish hostilities in 1920-1922.

In 1923 he offered Germany a large loan for currency stabilization and food supply and in the same year was reported to have bought control of the gambling casino at Monte Carlo.

He was married in 1924 to the Duchess of Marchena widow of a cousin of former King Alfonso of Spain. It was said that the two had met in early life and he had waited thirty years until the death of her husband permitted their marriage. She died two years later.

Schacht Sets Up Control Offices For All Industry

Agriculture Also Covered By Reich Decree On Raw Materials

Dr. Hjalmar Schacht's "new plan" for limiting German imports to capacity to pay has advanced an important step by the decree set forth Sept. 8 establishing special state-controlled offices for supervising the activities of practically all branches of industry and agriculture, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Since Germany can import only limited quantities of raw material, the important task of the control offices (all of which are centered in Berlin except one for furs and skins which is at Leipzig) is largely concerned with apportioning raw materials into the different industries. On the technical side they will help to further trade agreements based on goods competition which Germany intends to make with foreign countries.

Advocated by Darre

Such compensation agreements were advocated by Dr. Walther Darre, Reichsminister of Agriculture, at Nuremberg recently when he also spoke of the compromise between supply and demand through a statute furthering that economy within Germany itself—in other words, market control, which, in his opinion, would help considerably to make tariffs and similar measures superfluous.

The German-Bulgarian compensation agreement which is announced is an excellent example of the kind of arrangement which Germany wishes to conclude. For the long drawn-out negotiations toward understanding, involving 631,000,000 leva, $50,000,000 at the present rate have been arranged whereby Germany takes Bulgarian tobacco for this amount and Bulgaria accepts German manufactures and manufactured products in exchange. These latter will be mainly railway wagons, telephone apparatus and machinery. Although two years will be allowed for delivery it is said that most will be delivered in 1935. Bulgaria's payments extend over five years, which practically means a market for its tobacco harvest from 1934 to 1938 guaranteed.

Plan Favors Belgium

A new clearing arrangement between Germany and the customs union area of Belgium-Luxemburg, operating from Sept. 10, in addition to making provisional settlement for German coal exports to Belgium until December, also settles what is to be one with the surplus trade balance which Germany has with the two countries. This balance is left to the disposal of the German Reichsbank after a portion has been allocated to meet the charges of the Belgian portion of the Dawes-Young loans and certain private loans.

The question of redemption of the francs in circulation in the district since 1923 is also considered, in view of the possibility of the return of the Saar to Germany. The suggestion is made that French francs circulating in the district shall be applied to the transfer of German debts, of which a list shall be drawn up by the League.

France Guards Own People

France flatly told the League of Nations that the rights of her nationals in the Saar must be respected after the plebiscite on Jan. 13.

A memorandum submitted to the League demanded that the racial and religious rights of all Saar residents be respected, no matter how the Saarois voted in the plebiscite.

'Fine Personality' In Women Defined

Sense Of Fairness, Originality, Liveliness And Pleasant Voice Held Necessary

What it takes to be regarded popularly as "a girl of great personality" was identified recently at the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association at Columbia University. The girl needs to have a sense of fairness, originality, liveliness and a pleasant voice.

This answer was reported by Dr. Edwin G. Fleming, who solved the problem by finding eighty-four high school girls popularly regarded as "personalities" by their schoolmates. He then had each girl rated by three or more of her teachers for possession or absence or standard qualities identified in the latest character inventories devised by psychologists, says the New York Times.

The four qualities which he reported as the essence of a reputation for personality were found underlying all types. As a by-product of the research, Dr. Fleming also identified eight "personality types"; namely, the entertaining, the brilliant, the culture-talented, the just, the pretty, the good fellow, the good neighbor and the diplomat.

Intelligence and Wages

The 800 psychologists then went on to other advances they had made in human knowledge during the year.

An analysis of 10,000 examinations given at the Adjustment Service for unemployed adults in New York was reported by Paul S. Achilles, with the conclusion that there was no relation between the high intelligence of these unemployed as shown by tests and the comparatively low salaries they had been able to earn.

In an earlier report Dr. David Wechsler of the Bellevue Psychiatric Hospital, had pointed out, however, that persons may rate high in intelligence but be deficient in ability to apply it.

In contrast to the intelligent unemployed who came to the New York service looking for readjustment of their occupations a study of 500 transient men was made by the Buffalo Transient Bureau, with the observation that they were homeless wanderers because they had scanty schooling.

In another report M. M. White of the University of Kentucky said that he had tested the effect on forty-eight students of telling them a task was easy and of telling them it was hard before he assigned it. The tasks were the mastery of passages of prose or codes. Mr. White found that, whether the task was actually easy or hard, the students got more of it done if they were told beforehand that it was going to be hard.

An investigation of the widespread belief that one occupation is more respectable or admirable than another was reported by George W. Hartmann of Pennsylvania State College. He tested 450 persons by giving them twenty-five plain white cards each bearing the name of a single occupation, which they were to arrange in the order of prestige. He found that the professions generally stood near the top and the labor group near the bottom.

Traits of Character Tested

A study by Robert R. Sears of the University of Illinois was presented to show that persons having disagreeable characteristics which they did not recognize in themselves were abnormally condemnatory of those same characteristics in others. He induced the members of three fraternities to rate themselves and all their fellow-members on a seven-point scale as to degree of stinginess, obstinacy, disorderliness and bashfulness. Those who were rated by their associates as having more than the average amount of the traits were then divided into those whose own ratings admitted this and those who did not recognize it. Those who did not recognize the traits in themselves were noted by Mr. Sears to rate other people more rigidly.

A new technique in the experimental study of moods was reported by V. E. Fisher of New York University. He suggested moods to patients under hypnosis and then tested the resulting post-hypnotic mood. He found that speed of action increased in elated moods and decreased in despondent moods, but that in either of these moods more errors were made in test activities than were made in a normal mood.

An analysis of the attitudes of 8,419 voters in thirty-five States, obtained by statements concerning each of twelve important issues of the 1933 campaign was reviewed by Samuel P. Hayes Jr. of Yale University, with the conclusion that "the American political system represents successfully the wishes of the majority of the voters."

$201,000,000 Spent By N.Y. To Feed Needy

400,000 Families Receive Aid From City; Relief Sought By More Each Month

New York City will have spent $201,000,000 this year for public relief, or at the rate of $6.37 every time the clock ticks, with the 400,000 families on its relief rolls constituting a population exceeding that of most American cities, Commissioner of Public Welfare William Hodson reported on August 27. The cost total, of which the city's net share will be $50,000,000, has risen in giant strides since 1929 and 1930 when the bill was under $20,000,000, says the Christian Science Monitor.

In presenting his report—the first since the Fusion administration took office on Jan. 1—Commissioner Hodson takes cognizance of the proposed new relief financing plan of a one-half of 1 per cent tax on business income as "properly" making "every person with income a partner in the city's unprecedented task of providing the bare necessities of life to the destitute unemployed."

For the six months from Jan. 1 to July 1, relief expenditures reached a total of $80,374,362, of which $67,320,804 was for emergency activities, the commissioner's review shows. It takes as a gauge for the scope of activities the record for August, as follows:

One hundred and ninety thousand families on home relief, average aid close to $40 a month; 125,000 persons, mostly heads of families, on work relief, wages averaging $60 a month; 23,500 dependent children supported in boarding homes and institutions; 19,000 dependent children supported in own homes through grants to widowed or abandoned mothers; 9000 homeless men and women fed and lodged; 22,500 aged persons assisted in their homes; 29,000 veteran's families given relief through normal channels; 10 000 veterans' families on home relief; 800,000 free lunches for public school children and 7500 families given medical care.

Relief on Increase

"The picture does not change greatly from month to month, except that more and more people seem to come to the absolute end of their resources with each new month," Commissioner Hodson states. "At the present rate we will have spent during the entire calendar year $201,000,000 for all forms of public relief in this city. Due to liberal reimbursements out of state and federal relief funds, the city's net cost will be $50,000,000 for the year.

"This means that on the average we are spending $550,674.93 a day, or $22,945.20 an hour, or $382.42 a minute, or $6.37 a second, every time the clock ticks. Of this $6.37, about $1.60 represents the actual expense to the city."

Even so, the commissioner says, the amount of relief for each family is inadequate in many cases, and he adds that the city will be fortunate "if the need for relief during the coming winter is no greater than at present."

Aside from the growth in the volume of relief, three comparisons are made in the report between present emergency relief activities and those under previous administrations.

Still Is Inadequate

"First," it states, "home relief is rendered more promptly, with greater regularity, with more consideration for varying needs and with more courtesy; second, work relief projects are of a more constructive nature and workers are chosen with greater consideration of their previous occupations; third the amount of relief for each family is, we recognize, still inadequate.

"Every effort is being made to distribute available funds in the most equitable way possible, to recover relief funds illegally secured in the past by persons not actually in need, and to guard against further payment of relief funds or emergency work wages to persons not actually in need or not willing or able to do the work for which they are hired."

Commissioner Hodson recommends the abolition of home relief altogether and in its stead "provide every able-bodied needy person in the city with a work relief job, preferably the job he is best qualified to do."

Best to Give Work

"This is not the cheapest way of rendering relief, but from every point of view the soundest and most humane," he holds. "It would maintain the self-respect of the men and women who want to work for what they get, and it would give the city permanent benefits in the construction of streets, sewers, parks, playgrounds and other needed improvements.

"I understand that Federal Relief Administrator Harry Hopkins is in entire agreement with the idea of giving people work rather than cash relief. The administration of New York City will be glad to cooperate with him in furthering this policy if the Federal Government helps us through increased relief funds."

The report shows on the list of disbursements out of federal supply consignments 10,539,934 loaves of bread, 2,080,342 pounds of wheat, 4,224,790 pounds of butter, 585,884 dozen eggs, and 99,720 blankets.

The Big Bellow Man Of Danville

By shouting so loudly that his voice was heard for eight miles around, and in three states at the same time, Lee Chrisman, 32-year-old Kentucky farmer of Danville, set what is probably a world record.

In the quiet and stillness of the early morning in the mountains that mark the junction of Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, Chrisman—an auctioneer by profession—climbed to the top of the pinnacle of Cumberland Gap at 3 a.m. August 1, 1933, and then yelled as loudly as he could. Listeners stationed as judges in each of the three states, whose sworn statements are in my files, said they heard Chrisman's voice echo through the hills and valley for eight miles around.

Sinclair If Elected Will Pardon Mooney

If Upton Sinclair is elected Governor of California he says his first official act will be to pardon Thomas Mooney, convicted bomber of the San Francisco Preparedness Day parade in 1916, who has applied to five Governors for pardon without success.

In his book "I, Governor of California," the former Socialist author wrote:

"Immediately after having taken the oath of office, he (Sinclair) stepped to the microphone and said: 'As Governor of California my first action is to sign a pardon to Thomas J. Mooney. At this time I offer to him my profound apologies for the injustice which the State of California has done to him for the past eighteen years'."

Nazi Women Cheer Order to Stay at Home

2,000 At Nuremberg Rally; Hitler Tells Them To Shun Politics

Addressing 2,000 delegates of Nazi women's organization at the party congress here today, Adolf Hitler thanked them for their active support of his movement since its inception and proclaimed, as the one and only point in the Nazi program for women, "the child," says John Elliott in a Nuremberg dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune on Sept. 8.

"The idea of female emancipation is a mere invention of Jewish intellecualism and its content is a product of the same spirit," declared the anti-Semitic ruler of the Third Reich. He maintained that women had qualities complimentary to those of men, and that women never attempted to rule men except when men proved inadequate to their own tasks. No conflict between the sexes is possible, he said, so long as each limits itself to the tasks defined for it by nature.

If man's world is the state, one may perhaps find that woman's world is a smaller one, but the larger world could not exist if not based upon the smaller one, Hitler declared, and he lauded women as the center of family life. His feminine hearers, who filled every seat in the immense congress hall, applauded frantically as he added: "For these reasons, the two worlds never oppose each other. They commplement each other, they belong to each other, just as husband and wife belong to each other."

"World Should Remain Separate"

The Nazis, according to Hitler, do not think it right that women should enter the world of men, but "we think it natural that their worlds should remain separate." Women are asked to be willing to give their lives for the preservation of the family, and men must make those lives secure. Comparing masculine heroism on the battlefield with feminine capacity for self-forgetfulness and voluntary suffering, he said: "Each child that a woman brings into being means a battle fought by her for the existence or non-existence of her nation."

"It is not true," Hitler said also, "that, as maintained by Jewish intelectualism, mutual respect between the sexes can be attained only by merging their respective fields of activity. The truth is that mutual respect requires that each should refrain from interfering in the rightful tasks of the other."

Earlier in the day, 50,000 members of the Hitler Youth organization were reviewed by their leader in the Nuremberg Stadium. Ranging in age from fourteen years to eighteen, they represented the 4,000,000 members the organization has in the Reich. The others, remaining away for sheer lack of room for them here, stood in close ranks in their home towns today to listen to the broadcast of what Hitler said.

Hitler, greeted with resounding "Heils!" spoke to the boys for just ten minutes, saying in conclusion:

"Peace-Loving, but Brave"

"We want to be one people and you will form that united people. We want to destroy class barriers in our country, and it is you who will do it. We want to be one united Reich, and you are destined to achieve that goal."

He summed up his advice to the lads with the remark: "Be peace-loving, but brave," a prosaic rendering of Theodore Roosevelt's more picturesque phrase, "Walk softly, but carry a big stick."

"Give me the child until he is seven years old and I care not what you do with him thereafter," is reputed to be an old Jesuit saying, and while Hitler may not begin influencing the children of the Reich at quite so early an age, he and his advisers are evidently intent on controlling the education of German boys—and, incidentally, girls—and instiling Nazi principles in them so that, in the next generation, there will be no opposition to the Nazi regime in the Reich.

One effect of Nazi regimentation and military discipline which has been achieved in the short space of a single year was witnessed by American observers this morning. A year ago, in the same stadium, the enthusiasm of the Hitler youth knew no bounds. They yelled incessantly. "We want to see our leader!" and when Hitler appeared they broke out of bounds, forgot all about discipline and rushed to surround his automobile.

Enthusiasm Waning

Today enthusiasm for Hitler undoubtedly was there, but it lacked spontaneity, and the consequences of a year of drilling were apparent. The children of Nazi German are growing old before their time. This morning they behaved in an exemplary manner, kept their ranks like soldiers when Hitler came on the scene and cheered only when cheering was in order.

Most of the lads arrived in Nuremberg in special trains last night. They were dumped out at the station on the outskirts of the city and encamped in a "city" of some 2,500 canvas tents. Bugle calls aroused them at 5 o'clock this morning, and they marched in columns to the stadium. They stood in a broiling sun while waiting for Hitler's arrival, and he kept them in suspense until nearly 11 o'clock. When some of the boys fainted under the ordeal, Red Cross men were on hand to carry them away.

Coroner Franz von Papen, German Minister to Austria, was there, and so were Foreign Minister Konstantin von Neurath, Reichswehr Minister General Werner von Blumberg and Bishop Ludwig Mueller, primate of the German Protestant Church. The Roman Catholic Church, which is still trying to keep its boys in its own youth organization and out of the Hitler movement, was not represented by any high dignitary.

The only Catholic priest noticed among the guests of honor was Father Schachtleitner, an abbot of a Bavarian monastery, who is said to have been one of the earliest members of the Hitler movement and to have suffered persecution in his own church as a consequence.

example, he explained:

"Aviation in this country has become an almost exclusive domain of young men from wealthy schools. Also, our police are being reorganized in such a way as to facilitate their use for the protection of class interests. There is possible danger from both of these things."

Mr. Citrine, who is general secretary of the Trades Union Council, was asked today what notice, if any, the congress would pay to the textile strike in the United States.

"Perhaps not any," he replied. "British trade unionists have a traditional aversion to interference in the affairs of the American Federation of Labor, but if the United States labor men who are here as guest delegates intimate they would like some expression of our sympathy we certainly will respond."

Police Bar Leaves on Sunday

A notice was posted in London police stations on Sept. 4 stating that leave to officers of all ranks would be stopped on Sunday, Sept. 9, when a Fascist demonstration and a Communist counter-demonstration are planned for Hyde Park.

The notice is a sequel to conferences on the subject among Commissioner Lord Trenchard of the metropolitan police and Commissioner Sir Hugh Turnbull of the City of London police, and senior officers of both forces.

Indications are the authorities are permitting the demonstration, but are recruiting the full strength of the police as a precaution. The chief of he special constabulary was consulted and said he expected a full muster of special officers for traffic duties. The whole special branch of Scotland Yard will be detailed to Hyde Park and mounted police will be considerably augmented.

Final arrangements will be made tomorrow, when twenty-four superintendents of London's police divisions confer at Scotland Yard. It is possible that both the demonstration and the counter-demonstration will not be permitted simultaneously or in the same place.

Physicians Deride Cancer 'Discovery'

Tests In US Said To Explode German's Claim To Finding 'Organism' Of Disease

Leading cancer authorities in U.S. were emphatic recently in challenging a claim of Dr. Wilhelm von Bremer of Berlin to discovery of a cancer-causing organism. They were equally emphatic in challenging the further claim that this so-called organism thrives on alkaline nourishment and that its cancer-producing powers may be counteracted by "injection to acidify the blood."

"This is all rot," said Professor Francis Carter Wood, director of the Crocker Laboratories for Cancer Research, Columbia University, and editor of The American Journal of Cancer. "There's nothing to it. Plenty of this sort of stuff is coming out of Germany just now."

Dr. James Ewing, director of Memorial Hospital and one of the world's leading cancer pathologists, said:

"The claim is so improbable, so unsubstantiated and so unlikely that it is not even worth discussing!"

Holds Claims Disproved

Dr. Ira I. Kaplan, director of the cancer division of the city Department of Hospitals, discussed the matter in some detail.

"There is only another claim," Dr. Kaplan said, "to be added to the hundreds made every year by quacks or otherwise misguded persons. We have tested over a hundred such claims in the City Cancer Institute, not once but a number of times. They all proved to be absolutely worthless.

"The claim that cancer is caused by an organism has been disproved thoroughly again and again. The proof against such a claim is so overwhelming that cancer authorities are agreed that no such organism exists.

"While we do not know what causes cancer, we do know that it is not caused by a virus or other form of micro-organism. If this were the case we should be able to transmit cancer from one animal to another. Thousands of attempts have been made to do just that, but no one has ever succeeded.

Blood Tests Here Cited

"The German's claim that the so-called 'cancer-producing organism' first enters the blood and attaches itself to the red blood corpuscles has been demonstrated thousands of times in our city clinics and laboratories to be contrary to fact. We take as many as 10,000 blood tests of cancer patients in the city's Cancer Institute every year and we have never found anything in the blood of cancer sufferers that gives any significant clue to the existence of cancer.

"As to the claim that cancer can be checked by injections to make the blood acid that was finally disproved last year by the work of my assistant in charge of research, Dr. Anna Goldfeder. She carried on extensive investigations on the so-called 'acidotic treatment,' which also originated in Germany, to determine whether by increasing the acid content of the blood cancer would disappear, as was claimed.

"She established definitely and finally that while you may kill cancer cells in the test tube by certain doses of acid, or for that matter alkali, you cannot give a human patient enough acid or alkali to kill his cancer without at the same time also killing the patient. You cannot do to a living human being what you can do in a test tube."

16,000 From Saar Training In Reich, League Body Says

Knox Charges Seized Papers Show Direct Link To The German Authorities

League of Nations officials made public today charges by the League's governing commission in the Saar that 16,000 German residents of the territory were receiving military training in Germany in preparation for the Saar plebiscite next January, says a Geneva report to the New York Times on September 1.

The charges were based on documents seized at the office of the Voluntary Labor Service, a division of the German Front in the Saar. They were transmitted today to all members of the League Council.

Geoffrey G. Knox, chairman of the commission, asserted in his memorandum to officials here that the seized documents had "only added to the gravity of the charges already made against the German Front."

He declared that the documents proved that agents of the German Front were maintaining constant relations with Reich authorities and that many infractions of the criminal code had been uncovered as a result of the seizure.

Would Curb Members

The situation is so serious, Mr. Knox said, that the commission has drafted an order compelling the young men enrolled in the Voluntary Labor Organization to report to the police regularly.

More than 10,000 Saar Germans have already been trained in the Reich, Mr. Knox added, at a cost to Germany of 12,900,000 reichsmarks.

He asserts that the commission cannot "overemphasize the immediate need for the Council to give its strongest support by approaching the States that are members of the League with reference to recruiting police forces and gendarmerie" for the Saar.

The memorandum indicates that thousands of young Saarlanders are being educated solely with a view to the coming "struggle" and that "defense sports" are widespread in the territory.

It also says that deportation to concentration camps in Germany is one form of punishment for members of the Saar Voluntary Labor Service who are guilty of breaking any of its regulations.

Letter to Minister Seized

A letter to the German Minister of the Interior was included in the correspondence seized by the Saar Governing Commission at the offices of the Voluntary Labor Service, Chairman Geoffry G. Knox said in his report made public at Geneva on Sept. 1.

This letter, Mr. Knox said, asserted that "the Reich directorate is quite aware of the weighty political and national reasons" underlying the request that Saarlanders be put in German camps.

A letter from Saarbruecken to one of the German camps in part:

"It is absolutely essential that those quartered in the camp should understand that no narratives of what is going on there should be sent home."

The purpose of giving the military training was indicated, the commission said, in correspondence from Berlin that said the Saar residents should be kept in camp 'until they are recalled by the Saar in the plebiscite year."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Tick Fence

Ticks, those vicious blood-sucking mites that infest the hides of cattle and sheep, and even the skin of man, have been denied entrance into the state of Mississippi by means of double barbed wire fences, the fences being about twenty feet apart. The reason for this ingenious preventive is that the tick, after falling off the animal, seeks the first parking space available—leaves, rocks or sticks—and awaits the passing of another animal to which he may attach himself. Naturally between the fences no animal passes and the tick who gets in the forbidden area dies of malnutrition.

The stretch of double fence I illustrated is located in the area of Washington Parish, La. and Walthall County, Miss.

inferior soap. For laundry purposes carbonate of soda, silicate of soda (water glass) and silicate of ammonia served admirably. Good results were obtained with oxygenated water and perborates (borax powders).

Salad oil was made from various viscous liquids extracted from the marshmallow and other plants, colored yellow, spiced and preserved with benzoate of soda. Emulsified solutions of gums, such as agar-agar, were freely sold. Oils were also extracted from the kernels of cherries, peaches, plums and other fruits.

Coffee Substitutes

Figs, date stones, beans, acorns, beets, chestnuts, turnips—all played their part in providing substitutes for coffee. The coffee Ersatz most highly prized was brewed from roasted malt. Similarly, rose, strawberry, blackberry, cherry, acacia and black currant leaves served to make "tea." Infusions of dried hawthorn berries were the most popular.

Saccharine, in no sense the chemical equivalent of sugar, was used to sweeten this "coffee" and "tea." Since jams depend on sugar for their consistency, saccharine was of no use in preserving fruits. Marmalade contained no fruit at all. Various aromatic compounds were added to gelatinous masses to impart a spurious flavor of oranges, currants and grapes.

How far all this wartime and blockade experience will apply to Germany's present circumstances it is difficult to say. The government already effectually controls all trade. The restrictions on international commerce are reflected by an import drop of 10,500,000 marks for June in cotton, 10,900,000 marks in wool and 3,200,000 in copper. Food imports, on the other hand, rose nearly 9,000,000 marks, thanks to clearance arrangements which Germany has with some of her neighbors.

Chaco Warfare Getting Closer To Oil Co. Area

Paraguayan Drive On Villa Montes Reaches Vicinity Of American Leases

Concessions of the Standard Oil Company (N. J.) are imperiled by the Paraguayan advance into the Chaco, which has brought the fighting in recent weeks into oil territory and imperilled the Bolivian positions, according to word received by the State Department but not made public, says a recent article in the New York Times.

(The Standard Oil Company of Bolivia, a subsidiary of the New Jersey company, according to the parent organization, "holds an oil concession in Southern Bolivia dating from long prior to the present conflict." It is denied that the company has any concession "in the disputed territory." The present Chaco military operations, however, have gone outside the area the oil company designates as "the disputed territory.")

Not only has the sixth Paraguayan offensive in this major war in South America driving far into territory claimed by Bolivia in the Gran Chaco in recent weeks and brought Paraguayan troops to within fifty-eight miles by road from Villa Montes the bases of Bolivian operations but it has placed the Paraguayan forces in a position where a successfuly flanking movement might be launched, according to information received here.

Concessions Leased by Bolivia

The Standard Oil Company holds its concessions through a lease from Bolivia. According to information received by the State Department, one reason for the failure of peace gestures has been the determination of Paraguay to obtain possession of the potentially rich oil fields. If this were to occur, it is felt, serious international complications could not well be avoided.

British companies, including Backus, also have leases in this territory. Both Britain and the United States have placed an embargo on arms shipments to the belligerents in the hope of forcing them to conclude a peace.

Bolivia claims that, despite this embargo, Paraguay is having no difficulty in obtaining arms from other sources, whereas Bolivia is crippled by the inability to get such supplies.

"Paraguay enjoys the benefit of an international riverway which enables her to receive war supplies," said an official note to the State Department soon after the United States placed the embargo on shipments. "Bolivia, lacking that benefit, will be the only one to suffer the rigors of prohibition."

The State Department is hopeful that a permanent peace may be the outcome of acceptance by Paraguay late last week of preliminary proposals made by Argentina, Brazil and the United States. Reports from South America are not optimistic, however, holding that Paraguay will want to take advantage of her successes. Hostilities have not been suspended.

Paraguay captured Fort Picuiba on Aug. 15, which strengthened her tactical position tremendously. On Aug. 19 she captured Fort. 27th of November, the fourth important strategic position to be captured in a week and the fifty-seventh fortified position to be taken since hostilities began.

At that time Paraguay's troops held a straight line north to south along the Sixty-second meridian from the Pilcomayo River to the Twentieth parallel. Since then her troops have continued to advance.

Paraguay Reports Advance

BUENOS AIRES, Sept. 3.—The Paraguayan forces have arrived within two miles of Carandaiti, according to a communique from Asuncion. They have been advancing toward that town since Aug. 15, when they captured Fort Picuiba and changed the direction of their advance from the Pilcomayo River toward the northwest.

Unofficial dispatches from Asuncion tonight says Paraguayan detachments were taking up positions of advantage and carefully preparing to attack with the least possible risk of casualties. The Paraguayan command regards Carandaiti as the last barrier blocking the army's advance against the Bolivian general headquarters at Villa Montes.

Bolivian prisoners report Villa Montes is being hurriedly fortified and entrenched in anticipation of a decisive battle there. Although Villa Montes has long been the general headquarters of Bolivian operations in the Chaco, it has never been entrenched or fortified, as the Bolivian command felt certain it would never be threatened because of its distance from the Paraguayan positions.

The Paraguayan War Ministry also announced important advances toward Fort Ballivan in the Canada El Carmen sector, where the Paraguayans re-established contact with the Bolivians, who had retreated from three to seven miles along an extensive front, according to the communique.

The Paraguayans occupied new positions in this sector Saturday and immediately began bombarding the Bolivians with trench mortars.

27,000 Square Miles Occupied

The Asuncion War Ministry announced the Paraguayans had occupied 27,000 square miles in the Chaco since the middle of December, when a sweeping victory over General Hans Kundt's Bolivian armies at Forts Arce and Alihuata turned the tide of the war. The Bolivians retreated 185 miles westward to Fort Ballivan and 220 miles north and northwest to Camacho, Picuiba and Carandaiti. It points out that they Bolivian armies now occupy only a narrow strip of Chaco territory 300 miles long between Fort Ballivan and Carandaiti.

The present Paraguayan objective is to push the Bolivians out of this last footing. They then will be on the Bolivian plateau having lost the result of twenty-five years' penetration of the Chaco.

The Asuncion War Ministry's statement says the Bolivians have lost 40,000 dead, wounded and prisoners since the war began and that Paraguay has captured 122 Bolivian positions.

Count Karolyi, 50, Dead In Budapest

Leader Of Legitimists In Hungary Succumbs To Lingering Illness

Count Joseph Karolyi, leader of the Hungarian legitimists, died in Budapest on Sept. 10 after a lingering illness. He was 50 years old.

Count Karolyi enjoyed the special confidence of the former Empress Zita and was a proponent of moderation in legitimist policies. In the last two years his illness prevented him from participating activity in the movement, Count Anton Sigray acting as his deputy, says the New York Times.

It is believed that Count Sigray will succeed him as leader, in which case a more active policy is likely to be followed looking toward restoration of the Hapsburgs in Hungary.

Count Joseph Karolyi was a brother of the radical Count Michael, who delivered Budapest into the hands of Bela Kun's Bolsheviki in 1919, and to whose wife a visa to enter the United States was refused in 1925. Count Michael was exiled and his $6,500,000 estate confiscated, the Hungarian courts awarding 40 per cent to Count Joseph and other loyal members of his family.

In March, 1933, after he had succeeded Count Albert Apponyi as official leader of the party in Budapest, read a letter from the "hereditary King," Otto, son of the Empress Zita and the late Emperor Charles, which conferred on the new party leader the authority to speak for him.

The Count then announced that a cardinal principle of his policy would be economic union with Austria and abandonment of the old fear of that country. "Hungary and Austria need each other," he said.

For several years Count Joseph had maintained close relations with the exiled imperial family, playing the combined roles of diplomatic representative, confidant, tutor and secretary to Otto and general agent for innumerable purposes. In all capacities he aroused the suspicion of those opposed to the legitimist cause, even when he left Budapest in December, 1925, in the role of Santa Claus for the royal family, bearing six chests of Christmas gifts to the imperial exiles at Zita's home in Lequeito, Spain.

New Deal In US Criticized By Is British Savants

Sir Josiah Stamp Tells Science Session Curb On Profit Motive Deplorable

America's New Deal was pilloried without mercy today, chiefly by college professors, at the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, held at Aberdeen, Scotland.

Every speaker who mentioned the United States during the discussion on economic planning appeared to have his own grievance against President Roosevelt and his own reasons for thinking the American experiment was doomed, says the New York Times.

Sir Josiah Stamp, making his third speech here in four days, found particular fault with the Roosevelt program for placing obstacles in the way of profits.

"What appalls me about the American new order," he declared, "is not merely the speed at which things are being done, but the fact that men are being encouraged to suppose you can revive industry while you are still sitting on the mainspring. After all, the mainspring of all individualistic enterprise of any kind, outside Russia, is the making of profit. Unless you are getting people to make money, you will never get re-employment.

"Yet this is the last thing that seems to have been thought of in America. If the result of all your regimentation is a red ink figure you will always have a trade depression."

More resentful still was Professor David MacGregor of Oxford, who complained bittery that President Roosevelt was moving too fast and with "too much fuss."

Originality Is Questioned

"We in Britain dealt the cards of the New Deal long ago," he exclaimed. "It is not a new deal at all, but it is just dealing in a hurry."

Industrial codes and social insurance, he said, had been part of the British economic picture ever since the Lloyd George budget of 1909.

"Roosevelt is now thinking of social insurance," he said, and there was a roar of laughter from the conomists crowding the room. "He is trying to crowd into six months what we in this country have accomplished over a period of twenty-five years. Yet our economists go to America and come back and shout down the microphone as though the American program were something new."

Another objection was voiced by Professor Alexander Gray of Aberdeen University, who said the planners in the United States were overestimating the future population of their country.

"Not so long ago, I imagine, there was more or less no limit within reason which the prophets might have assigned to the population of the United States," he said. "Today, we know—as far as we can know these things—that the population of the United States is approaching a stationary stage. Can it not be said that the United States has, in many respects, builded for a large population than it is likely to achieve?

"In such matters as railways, electricity, housing and schools, the relationship between population and demand is obvious and any plan must be framed on the assumption of a certain population."

Planning Is Upheld

Despite these and other attacks on the Roosevelt program, however, all today's speakers professed devotion to the ideal of planning. Their dilemma was expressed by Sir Josiah Stamp when he confessed that he was still trying to find his own "economic niche" somewhere between the Communist planning of Russia and the old unrestrained individualism of the Coolidge era in the United States.

Uncoordinated individualism had led to many mistakes in the past, he said, but absolute planning was "equally likely to lead to a ghastly muddle."

The discovery of a new and cheaper method of producing heavy water was announced to the chemistry and physics sections of the association today. According to Professor Eric K. Rideal, who has been directing the work on heavy hydrogen at Cambridge, the new process uses 75 per cent less current than the usual electrolytic method, which now produces heavy water for $15,000 a quart here and in the United States.

The basis of the new process is the discovery made a few years ago that there is an exchange reaction or substitution of elements when hydrogen is combined with certain other gases. Thus the combination of hydrogen and ethylene is not a mere addition, but involves an actual shifting of atoms from one to the other. The phenomenon occurs when hydrogen is combined with benzine.

The first stage in the new process is the creation of ordinary hydrogen by the usual electrolytic method. The ordinay hydrogen is then bubbled through water in the presence of a catalyst. Bubbling strips the hydrogen of a large part of its heavy component and leaves heavy hydrogen remaining in a more or less pure state.

Patents for the new process have already been applied for in Britain, Professor Rideal announced. He expressed the belief that it would cheapen the cost of the precious substance considerably and make supplies more plentiful in laboratories throughout the world.

Sir Arthur Eddington faced a crowded lecture hall today when he began to expound a theory of electric charge and mass, but his paper was highly mathematical and passed the understanding of many of the scientists in the room.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

Secret Of Life Not Known, Marconi

Inventor Tells Congress Of Scientists At Venice It Is Impenetrable

Science, Senator Guglielmo Marconi told the International Congress of Electro-Radio Biology on Sept. 10, has absolutely failed to explain the problem of life. This fact, said the man who invented wireless telegraphy, "would be truly frightening were it not for faith."

Eight Nobel Prize winners, says the New York Times, including Dr. Arthur H. Compton, the noted Chicago physicist, were among the distinguished members of the assemblage which heard the Italian scientist say:

"The mystery of life is certainly the most persistent problem ever placed before the thought of man. There is no doubt that from the time humanity began to think it has occupied itself with the problem of its origin and its future, which undoubtedly is the problem of life. The inability of science to solve it is absolute. This would be truly frightening were it not for faith."

Cites Science's Vast Frontiers

Senator Marconi continued, in the complete silence of an attentive audience.

"If we consider what science already has enabled men to know—the immensity of space, the fantastic philosophy of the stars, the infinite smallness of the composition of atoms, the macrocosm and microcosm whereby we succeed only in creating outlines and translating a measure into numbers without our minds being able to form any concreat idea of it—we remain astounded by the enormous machinery of the universe.

"If, then, we pass toward the consideration of the phenomena of life, this sentiment is accentuated, the complexity of the different organs which all work out in coordinated and determinate functions, the constant preoccupation for the conservation of the species, man's marvelous adaptation of his constitution to surroundings, the transmission of instincts, the mechanism of thought and reasoning, and, lastly, the specter of death place man, who wishes to explain the tormenting mystery, before a book closed with seven seals."

Train Passes Over Baby Who Enjoys Experience

Rengo

BELGRADE—Tika Steblovnik a child of 17 months, sat down to play with stones on the railway track, unnoticed by the mother who was gossiping to villagers near Ljubljana.

Suddenly an express train rounded the bend. The driver and the mother saw the baby's danger, but it was too late to do anything, and the train passed over her.

The mother rushed forward with a shriek expecting to find only the mangled remains of her child. Instead she found Tilka sitting between the rails laughing to herself; it was one of best games she had ever played.

The woman took her to hospital, but the doctor found no injury and said that the child had not even suffered from shock.

Methodists Move To Unite 3 Bodies

Proposal Revived As Southern Unit Sets 1944 As Goal For Union

The reopening of an organized movement to merge the three leading bodies of Methodism in the United States was announced on September 8 at the Methodist Book Concern Building, 150 Fifth Avenue, says the New York Times.

If the unification is consummated, it will mean a body of close to 7,500,000 communicants. The year 1944 has been set as the goal when it is hoped to have the single Methodist body.

Bishop Edwin Holt Hughes of the Washington Area, Methodist Episcopal Church, has been named as chairman of a special committee of fifteen on unification. The work of the committee will be to draft a "unification plan." This will be presented and discussed, it is expected, at a meeting in February.

Ten years ago it was believed the Methodist Episcopal Church, which takes in congregations in the North, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, would unite, but there was a halt in this move. The proposal, when submitted to the local conferences, failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote.

The Methodist Episcopal Church at its quadrennial general convention in Springfield, Mass., in May, 1928, had voted 820 in favor of the split of the church, South, from the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, which had been the one body. The split was over the slavery question.

Higher Commercial School Anniversary

Ceremony On October 21 Will Celebrate Occasion

The Tenth Anniversary of the opening of the Yokohama Higher Commercial School will be celebrated at a congratulatory meeting to be held at the auditorium of the school on Sunday October 21, at 10 a.m.

The program will commence with the singing of the National Anthem, and will be followed by the opening address of Mr. Tsuneo Tajiri President of the school. Congratulatory addresses by the Minister of Education, by guests present, by representatives of graduates and students, and the singing of the school song will bring the meeting to a close.

Following the function, a publication ceremony in recognition of those faculties and officials who have rendered services and have served for ten years or more in the school will take place.

Replicas and testimonials of the school and memorial gifts of alumni will be given by President Tajiri.

After the ceremony a luncheon will be held for the guests.

U.S. Gains 426 Concessions In Cuban Treaty

Text Reveals Tariff Cuts On More Products Than First Announced

The new trade pact between Cuba and the United States contains 426 items of merchandise on which Cuba agrees to make tariff concessions to the United States, the full text of the agreement, made public today by the State Department, disclosed. The United States makes concessions on thirty-five items, according to a Washington dispatch of the New York Herald Tribune on August 23.

The details of the schedules and the text of the covering agreement occupy sixty-three pages. Although largely summarized in the official report made public yesterday by the State Department when the treaty was signed and proclaimed by President Roosevelt, the text shows that even more products were included in the completed negotiations than were mentioned at first.

Graham Congratulates Hull

Preliminary applause and disapproval came from American commercial interests. Secretary of State Cordell Hull was warmly congratulated by Robert C. Graham, chairman of the export committee of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce and vice-president of the Graham-Paige Motors Corporation. He telegraphed as follows:

"We congratulate you upon the successful consummation by our government of the trade agreement with Cuba which is a most important and hopeful development in the restoration of international trade. The economic significance of a reduction of both internal and external barriers to increased world trade cannot be too strongly emphasized in their importance to increased employment. A comparison of Cuban average consumption of nearly 5,000 American motor vehicles annually from 1926 to 1930, and a subsequent drop to less than 700 average for the years 1931 to 1933 offers a spectacular illustration of one reason for decreased employment in American automobile production centers."

The trade pact cuts the Cuban tariff on American passenger automobiles 50 per cent in the case of cars costing less than $750 and smaller but substantial amounts in the case of costlier cars.

Protest From Florida

One of the first protests against the pact, vigorous in the extreme and indicating the kind of storm which the "Yankee trading" tariff policy may encounter, was lodged today by George S. Fletcher, president of the Florida Agricultural Tariff Association. He said that no hurricane which ever swept the Southern states "has hit Florida so hard as this new treaty." "Under the pretense of adopting a harmless seasonal tariff" which will permit early Cuban fruits and vegetables to enter America seasonally prior to the time when home-grown products are ready for market, all duties on winter vegetables are reduced, he declared.

American sugar interests temporarily withheld comment. It was held by officials that the existing quota arrangements continued to protect American producers even though the tariff on Cuban sugar was cut from 1½ cents a pound to 9-10 of a cent. In one sugar quarter it was pointed out that the linking of the Cuban sugar tariff with the quota system, with which it is made co-terminous, left Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, still more in control of the whole sugar situation. That continuation of the quota system is in his hands.

"Gift to Cubans," Says Mead

"This gift to the Cubans would seem to be most generous," said Royal D. Mead, counsel for the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association. Hawaiian sugar producers have been dissatisfied with their quota allotment.

Optimistic members of the Administration took the view today that the Cuban trade pact would open the way to a series of bilateral trade agreements with other countries in a comparatively short time and thus revive American foreign trade. It was acknowledged at the State Department, however, that no actual negotiation of any other pact was yet in sight.

Various other countries, particularly in Latin America, are considered to be likely prospects and preliminary studies for potential arrangements have been initiated. In the case of Colombia a trade pact was initialed last winter but it has been held up, awaiting approval of the Colombian Legislature. There are indications it may be withdrawn for revision.

Studies now under way contemplate the possibility of trade pacts with Brazil, Chile, Argentina, and other South American countries as well as two or three nations in Europe.

The text of the Cuban pact follows the summary of yesterday. Its preamble advances the desire of the two countries to "strengthen the traditional bonds of friendship and commerce" by "maintaining as a basis for commercial relations the granting of reciprocal preferential treatment."

The Department of Commerce issued another summary of the pact and a list of the old and new rates on products involved. The State Department also published an exchange of notes with Cuba covering the limitation of exports of avocadoes and pineapple slips from Cuba a matter not covered in the treaty itself.

The chief American concessions were disclosed yesterday. They are decreases in the rates on Cuban sugar, rum, tobacco and off-season fruits and vegetables. These comprise well over 90 per cent of the island's exports to the United States. The text showed today that in addition the United States is granting concessions on certain syrups and molasses, honey, fish, corn, limes, jellies, mango pastes, peppers, sponges distilled grapefruit oil, crude glycerine, cement floor and wall tiles and mahogany in the form of sawed boards.

Each country also agrees to accord to the other country national and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to Federal internal taxes on articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the one imported into the other, and not to increase these taxes or impose new taxes during the life of the agreement on those items on which the customs duty may not be increased, the Commerce Department pointed out.

Consular Fees Restricted

"Effective July 1, 1935, the two countries agree not to impose any fees for the consular certification of any shipment of merchandise in excess of 2 per cent of the value of the goods f. o. b. port of exportation This limitation applies, however, only when the fees for these services would otherwise be in excess of $2.50 pesos on articles of United States origin (the present Cuban consular certification fee is 5 per cent of the f.o.b. value of the merchandise, at port of exportation).

"The United States and Cuba agree that no quantitative restrictions shall be imposed on any imported article the growth, produce or manufacture of the other, enumerated and described in the schedules of the agreement. This is without prejudice, however, to the special arrangements regarding sugar and tobacco in connection with the United States quota program for these products, as Article B of the agreement excepts from the above provision articles the domestic production of which is controlled.

Provision on Petroleum

"While the agreement as signed provides for no additional concessions to American petroleum products, by virtue of a provisional note included in Schedule 1, Cuba agrees that, in the event of changes in its present tariff schedule on petroleum, the question of nomenclatures, rates and preferences will be reopened for negotiation with the United States.

"In connection with the Cuban duties applying to vegetable and animal oils and fats, many of the particular rates of duties to the United States have been established in a definite relation to the others. Cuba agrees not to decrease the import duties and consumption taxes on any of these products (which comprise hog lard, compound lard, vegetable oils and other animal fats) unless simultaneous and proportionate reductions are made in all of them.

Arms Inquiry Links Zaharoff With U.S. Firm

Senate Committee Hints Connection With Company Contracting For Navy

WASHINGTON, Sept. 1.—Evidence of a direct connection between Sir Basil Zaharoff, powerful in European munitions circles, and a concern building ships for the American Navy has been placed in the hands of the Senate munitions investigating committee.

This disclosure was made a short time before Senator Gerald P. Nye, Republican, North Dakota, chairman of the committee, in a radio address tonight accused munitions makers of spreading talk of war; from which they made "splendid profits."

Denouncing sales of war materials abroad, Senator Nye asserted that in case of a war with Japan Americans would be mowed down with American-made munitions. He advocated a "Department of Peace," which would rank with the Army and Navy Departments.

Members of the Senate committee declined to discuss the letters that are reliably reported to show Zaharoff's connection with an American ship builder.

It was learned by The Associated Press early today unless there is a change in schedule, the Senate Committee will go directly into the affairs of the Electric Boat Company, of New York and Groton, Conn., during the first two days of open hearings. This concern, records at the Navy Department show, received contracts for construction of two submarines in the Navy's building program last year, and for three of the under-water craft this year.

Bocmed Submarine Business

Although both committee members and investigators were silent, it was established that the reported Zaharoff link was to be brought out during questioning of the Electric Boat Company's officials.

Zaharoff's European connections are of academic interest only to Senate committee members. But one of the things that the inquiry has centered upon is whether there is any tie-up between some of the foreign companies which have made enormous profits through supplying munitions and groups in America engaged in the same business.

It is known that the letters to be introduced, some reported to be written by Sir Basil, are believed by committee members to substantiate to some degree the theory that some munitions and armament makers in America are allied with similar concerns abroad.

The effect, or lack of effect, of the embargo on munitions to Paraguay and Bolivia is to be studied when officials of the American Armament Corporation of New York, are called to the stand.

Most of the second week of the hearings will be given over to a scrutiny of the ramified activities of du Pont, maker of powder and chemicals, and the sales for military purposes of airplanes.

The investigation will suspend hearings temporarily after the third week, which will be devoted principally to the affairs of American concerns that manufacture poison gas.

Nye Talks on Japan

After declaring that munitions manufacturers were influential in spreading war talk, Mr. Nye in his address said the United States was told to "look out for Japan" and her increased military budgets.

"Yet we permit the merchants who sell war supplies to fool America, while like merchants are fooling the people of Japan," he said, "and we are off on race that will get neither anywhere but into trouble, while the merchants roll in this wealth made by the planting of suspicion and breeding fear."

He cited gigantic increases in profits made by American corporations during the World War as compared with the four years before the conflict. Among them he listed the Atlas Powder Company, Hercules Powder Company, General Motors, Anaconda Copper, United States Steel and Bethlehem Steel Companies in addition to the du Pont interests.

Referring to Irenee du Pont, an organizer of the American Liberty League, Mr. Nye said Mr. du Pont was quoted as saying he saw a Red plot in the investigation, and added that he would "see red" if anything was done to interfere with the profits that the du Pont made during the World War here.

London on the Thames

It is popularly believed that there is only one London in all the world, but there is one other—London, Ontario—a city of about sixty thousand inhabitants, half way between Toronto and Detroit. And Believe It or Not, this London of New World is also on the Thames River—the names being taken from the ancient city and river of England respectively.

The Fastest Human

Probably no foot racer in history has a more unique record than that of Ralph Metcalf of Marquette University who has won 89 of his 96 races, and bettered the world's record 13 times. At 40 yards he has won 9 times; 50 yards, once; 60 yards, 11 times; 80 meters, 3 times, 70 yards, once; 100 yards, 18 times; 100 meters, 15 times; 200 meters, 14 times; and 220 yards, 17 times.

A Champion Job Holder

Herman Kabakoff of Cincinnati, Ohio, isn't exactly proud of his record—375 jobbs in about nine years' time—but he does feel that he has gained a keen insight into businesses of all kinds. Bumped from pillar post, Kabakoff has taken any job that has come along to earn a meager living for support of his family, and would like nothing better than to settle down at one steady job and work ahead. Though many lines of business have hit his fancy at various times, nothing to him is more appealing than theatrical work.

of the Kansai from which he had only returned the day before. Although he had merely passed through by car, the conditions that met his eyes in Osaka were appalling, and Kyoto sustained considerable losses but Kobe, he said was not so badly damaged.

Committee chairman, Mr. S. Nomura's activities was mentioned in the July 24, 1934 Bulletin stressing the peace consciousness of the younger generation, it was announced.

A Rotarian from Baden-Baden, Germany, requested by letter for information concerning him who was an intimate friend of the writer during their student days. It turned out to be an acquaintance of Mr. Nomura's so these two letters were turned over to him.

Three editions of "Taiwan Sawa", a story of Formosa in Japanese by Rotarian Hidehara of Taihoku were received, said the chairman and members interested reading them were referred to the Secretary.

Mr. Yoshida stated that the Tokyo-Yokohama Rengo Golf Tournament will be held at Hodogaya on October 13. The match against the Nagoya club is expected to be played off on October 5 at Fujisawa but Nagoya had not confirmed the fixture.

Mr. Doi read a card from Isome notifying of his arrival in Vancouver on September 15, and also letters from Governor Murata and Kansai brother clubs on the recent Kansai disaster.

U.S. Trade With Russia Lags, Awaiting Credit Agreement

It is somewhat surprising to find that trade between the United States and the U. S. S. R., far from improving since recognition last November, has continued the downward curve which has characterized economic relations between the two countries during the last three years. The "boom" year of Soviet-American business was 1930, when imports from the United States reached the round figure of $130,000,000, although Soviet exports were only $24,000,000, according to Mr. Walter Duranty's article in the New York Times. His dispatch is from Moscow.

In the following year the figures were $113,000,000 and $13,000,000; since 1932 business has steadily decreased. Although statistics for the first half of 1934 are not yet forthcoming, it can be said without fear of contradiction that their total will be lower than for the corresponding period of 1933. Indeed, I should question whether the total turnover of exports and imports combined for the past six months is greater than 20,000,000 gold rubles.

What, then, has become of the glowing hopes for bigger and better business that were widely expressed at the end of the recognition negotiations last November? Senator Brookhart for instance, who has long interested himself in the economic relations between the two countries, rushed into print with the statement that half a billion dollars' worth of business might be done in 1934, while more conservative estimates did at least count upon a figure of $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. Instead of that, business has dwindled and American business men both at home and in the U. S. S. R., have found that the orders they expected failed to materialize or were placed in countries other than their own.

The Period of Buying

Before discussing the immediate and recent reasons for this disappointing state of affairs it is necessary to remember that the years 1930 to 1932 inclusive were the period when the Soviet was buying abroad what it needed for the first Five-Year Plan, or rather, to be more exact, when order placed earlier were being filled. Thus in 1930 the total imports into the U. S. R. S. reached a figure of 1,058,000,000 gold rubles, compared with an export total of 1,036,000,000 rubles. In the following year imports totaled 1,105,000,000 rubles, but exports dropped in value to 811,000,000 rubles, although their volume was slightly larger than in the previous year. In 1932 imports were 698,000,000 and exports 563,000,000, with the result that in the three years combined the Soviet had a passive balance of 450,000,000 rubles.

These figures show with unpleasant brevity what the world depression did to the U. S. S. R. The Soviet was importing machinery and other equipment, the price of which had fallen little, or machinery and equipment that had been ordered at earlier peak prices, and trying to pay for it by the export of raw materials whose world market price in some cases had dropped 50 per cent.

Last Year Critical

As foreign observers had forecast in 1931 and 1932, the Soviet found 1933 its most onerous year as far as meeting its foreign obligations was concerned. It did meet them successfully, but its difficulties in this respect would have been enormously increased had not the "D banks" of Germany early in March of that year agreed to "revolve" a then due credit of approximately $50,000,000 for another twelve months. The Soviet realized the danger, with the result that in 1933 imports were ruthelssly cut in half as compared with 1932 and there was an active balance of more than 150,000,000 rubles.

Originally conceived as the fifth year of the first plan, 1933 became nominally the first year of the second plan, because the first plan was declared to be finished in four years—that is, by the end of 1932. In point of fact, 1933 may be considered an intermediate year between the two plans—statistical figures for the second were not announced until the beginning of 1934—and served as a much needed breathing space.

Foreign Commitments

To complete the picture it may be added that Soviet foreign commitments, which had reached between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000 at their peak in 1931-32 have been reduced to little more than $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 today. The reduction is due not only to the active trade balance of the past eighteen months but to the increase in gold production, which has now reached a monthly figure of $12,000,000 to $15,000,000(at the present dollar value) and will probably attain $20,000,000 in September.

At first sight it may seem that the foregoing facts and figures are ancient history, which has very little to do with the present deadlock in Soviet-American economic relations. This, however, is not the case, because the Soviet has drawn up its second Five-Year Plan in the light of past experience and is determined to avoid in the future the delicate position in which it was placed in 1931-32 by the fall in prices of its principal exports.

It must be remembered also that, although the first Five-Year Plan may not have had the full success that was claimed for it, it did add very greatly to the Soviet's own home production of metallurgic and other equipment, notably automotive machinery, particularly agricultural—tractors, combines, &c. The U. S. S. R. today leads the world in this field of production, and its import of foreign agricultural machinery has virtually ceased. Indeed, leading Soviet spokesmen at the Communist Party Congress last January, when the second Five-Year Plan was discussed, were careful to emphasize the fact that it could, if necessary, be accomplished with little or no foreign assistance—that is to say, importation of foreign equipment.

Industrial Production

How far this boast was justified may be seen from figures recently made public of the total heavy industrial production for the first six-months of 1934. Expressed in prices of the years 1926-27 these amounted to 9,488,400,000 rubles as compared to 7,348,900,000 for the same period of last year, an increase of 2,139,500,000 rubles, or 29 per cent. The annual program was fulfilled to the extent of 47.4 per cent in the first six months—that is to say, only 2.6 per cent below schedule. The number of workers employed in heavy industry rose by 100 per cent, and the output per individual workers by 16.8 per cent.

It may therefore be said that the whole foreign-trade program of the U. S. S. R. was revised in the period between 1932 and 1934. Henceforth, it was decided, there would be few or no orders placed abroad on comparatively shortterm credits, which might cause difficulties arising from a sudden fall in the price of export products. On the contrary, the Soviet was now prepared to make its own equipment if necessary—even should that involve a slowing down of its program—unless foreign credits of four or five years should be forthcoming.

In some quarters in America, and for that matter elsewhere, the thought was expressed that the diminution of Soviet orders in 1933, which was particularly noticeable in the United States, was due to the wish to exercise pressure for recognition, that is, to the hope that American manufacturers would advocate recognition and the granting of large long-term credits in order to enable the Soviet to do business with them. This accusation is by no means new but I think that the facts and figures abovementioned go far to disprove it.

American Debt Claims

As far as the United States is concerned it was, as I have said, generally expected last November that considerable long-term credits would be forthcoming. That these expectations proved incorrect was due, it seems, to a mutual misunderstanding which occurred during the coversations prior to recognition last November. The misunderstanding concerned the liquidation of American debt-claims against the U. S. S. R., with which the question of credits was closely linked.

As the whole world knows, when the Bolshevikl seized power in 1917 they repudiated all debts of previous Russian governments on the ground that the money received had been used to oppress the masses. Despite all pressure, they have maintained this principle ever since, but on various occasions have indicated that, although they would never "recognize" debts, they might on certain conditions agree to a way of paying them.

Thus contracts were made with foreign claimants in such form that the latter might compensate themselves for an old debt from new business some years ago. Stalin enunciated the Soviet attitude in this matter more clearly by stating that the U. S. S. R. was prepared to pay extra interest on credits, which would permit donors of credit to apply this extra annual percentage to the liquidation of their earlier debt claims.

When the question of debts and private claims was discussed during the preliminary negotiations in Washington last November it was mutually agreed that Stalin's principle would be applied to the settlement. There was no mention of the specific sum involved (subsequenly it has been said to range from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 in total settlement, which would be liquidated by extra interests from credits over a term of years) and unfortunately there was no precise-definition of the word "credits."

The Russians understood it to mean new advances assisted or guaranteed by some governmental organization—perhaps through the RFC—on a considerable scale and for a fairly long term—in short, a special transaction between the two governments or between organizations of said governments undertaken to secure a debt settlement. It would not ,therefore, in Soviet opinion, affect private credits from American firms which the Soviet had previously obtained or might obtain later.

The Plan of Credit

The amount of credit to be given was expected to range from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000—with governmental assistance and control—which was to be held in the United States at Soviet disposal for Soviet purchases, perhaps in a bank specially created for the purpose. Such a bank was indeed formed in Washington and its charter provided a clause exempting credits it might give from the veto in the Johnson bill—then approaching enactment—which forbids credits to nations "in default" on debts. This was a logical and natural provision, because the only way the Soviet could issue from technical default was by paying interest on credits.

So far so good; but when the question came up for consideration in Moscow last Spring, the Russians found to their dismay that the American Government believed the Soviet had agreed to pay extra interest on all credits in the United States, whether governmentally assisted or private, and furthermore that, instead of their having a fixed global sum at their disposal, each credit transaction was subject to separate agreement.

Which meant—in Soviet opinion—that the Soviet would be required to commit itself to settlement of the global debt figure (the $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 above mentioned) without having any certainty of how much it would receive in credits. It therefore refused to begin any detailed negotiations whatsoever unless it should receive some assurance of the global amount of credits, "extra" interest on which would be applied to the settlement of American debts and claims.

Washington's Position

Washington maintained that the Russians had agreed to the debt settlement in principle last November and that the correct procedure would be to go right ahead and fix the global figure to which said "extra" interest should be applied, and in the meantime to arrange facilities for one credit transaction after another, with the understanding that to all of them extra interest would be added for debt settlement.

The Soviet declared that this put it in the unfair and impossible position of agreeing to make payments without knowing whether it could fulfil them—in the event, for instance, if the Americans at a given moment declining further credits. In short, the Rusians averred that the American attitude was tantamount to extracting from the Soviet virtual recognition of debt, which would infringe that inviolable principle laid down by Lenin.

The Americans, on the other hand, have pointed out that once the credit ball started rolling it would have a snowball effort and that in twelve months the Russians might easily find the total amount of credits greater than any global sum they would be willing to accept today. There are doubtless other points at issue, but that is the main difficulty.

Looking backward, it seems a pity that both since did not strike while the iron was hot. Litvinoff had stayed a few days longer in Washington last November, he might well have obtained American consent to name a global sum of the first year's credits on which the framework of the debt settlement might be constructed. The administration then had large sums at its disposal, and the absence of opposition—not to say the welcome—with which recognition was received would probably have obviated serious impediments, particularly when it was stipulated that all money put at Soviet disposal should be spent in the United States to give work to American factories.

Rocket Artillery Latest Menace To Civilization

a rocket to carry 500 miles now may be considered solved. The rocket rises until the fuel is exhausted when it falls in a parabola. In travelling 592 miles, the distance from Paris to Berlin, the rocket would reach a maximum height of 200 miles, and once having passed the atmosphere to the stratosphere, it would go faster and further owing to lessened air resistance.

Method of Aim and Control

Methods of aiming and controlling are now being investigated. They can be secured by the alteration of the size of the nozzle at the rear of the rocket through which the gases are expelled, the smaller the nozzle the greater the pressure forward. The direction would be secured by the alteration of the size of the nozzle at the rear of the rocket through which the gases are expelled, the smaller the nozzle the greater the pressure forward. The direction would be secured, first by the catapult, and later by stabilizing fins on the rocket itself or a gyroscope, such as is used to control the rudders of a torpedo. At the present moment, the control of direction and range are crude, and the facilities for practice limited, but there is no doubt that the new "gunners" will develop the technique.

In America, the menace of the rocket gun is fully realized. "Baltimore and Washington could be reduced by an enemy fleet resting safely in the Atlantic, far beyond the range of 20 mile coastal defence guns," says one writer, "Or our Pacific ports might fall without a serious blow being struck."

The rocket as a projectile has all the advantages and none of the limitations of ordinary shells. Its maximum speed is not reached at the commencement of its journey, no huge gun is required to fire it and tho projectiles could follow one another almost as quickly as shells from a Stoke's mortar. The only warning of an approach of a flight of these deadly missiles would be a long drawn out whine. There would be no time to run for shelter, no time for "lights out." Large cities would be completely at the mercy of gunners 500 miles away, and there would probably be no attempt to find definite targets. With a huge target like London, twenty miles square, the gunners would hardly miss.

The experiments being conducted in Germany, Italy, France and Russia are to discover the peacetime possibilities of rockets. But Professor Oberth, an authority on rockets, speaking to scientists in Vienna stated that he believed every war office was already at work perfecting the rocket for future warfare. He warned his audience that the rocket would probably be developed to the limit of its destructive powers. Next year experts at the Naval Conference will discuss the limitation of the caliber of guns and other technical matters.

Will they maintain a discreet silence on rocket artillery, which when perfected would make every arms convention a farce?

vert to Germany, and withdrawal of the franc which now constitutes the Saar's currency. Certainly transfer of the Saar from the League's administration will raise embarrassing questions for Germany, which is again pleading its poverty.

Again, what will become of the minorities, political, religious or racial, in the event of reversion of the Saar to Germany? France demands full equality of all citizens and in the thought of the electoral manifesto states it is prepared for its part to grant liberty to all alike. It wants protection for Jews, Socialists and for those who vote for the status quo.

Those who would vote for a continuation of the present League regime are entitled to know in advance the precise constitution which would be given them. The French want these points brought out. The solution of most of the problems which will arise depends upon the League Council, which France urges to take the matter in hand in its present session.

If the inhabitants are transferred to either France or Germany they would individually have the right of voting for the nationality they prefer. There should be safeguards of rights of ownership. Judicial decisions of the past 15 years must not be disturbed. Social insurance and pensions should be maintained. France asks for establishment of a mixed arbitral tribunal in the Saar for another 15 years to guarantee these and similar rights.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Ever-Blooming Rosebush

August 19, 1934 was "National Pilgrimage Day" to the shrine of Lourdes where, in 1858, the Blessed Virgin appeared to a little peasant girl, announcing to her "I am the Immaculate Conception."

Hundreds of thousands of pilgrims annually flock to pray at the grotto where the Virgin appeared to the little girl 18 times. The cave now holds a statue of Our Lady of Lourdes, depicted as she appeared to the little peasant. Beside the statue there is a rosebush which, I was assured, blooms continuously the year around.

phenomena resulting from the New Deal.

First, it demonstrates a public psychology developed and fostered by the paternalistic administration at Washington whereby a large body of voters has been educated to rely on government instead of upon their individual efforts.

Second, the revolt of disillusioned and disappointed voters who are willing to try anything once.

Sinclair is a living sign of the times, possibly even another bitter lesson the people must learn while grouping their way back to the road they lost.

PASADENA
Democratic Switch Predicated
From The Post (Ind. Rep.)

A new leader has captured the Democratic party and many of the old members will feel obliged to move out.

Their decisions will be based in part on inclination and in part on a businesslike measuring of strength as between Merriam and Haight.

The Republican party does not have such a distinct cleavage. Very few of its members will go the whole way to Sinclair. The question is, Will any large number of them go half way?

The size of the order will, therefore, have to receive the approval of the War Department before any design information is released to your company.

Design information on the following components pertaining to the latest United States anti-air-craft material both to the 9-inch and of the 105 mm. types will be released to your company:

Guns.
Mounts, except hydropneumatic recuperators.
Data transmission systems.
Sights.
Fire-control instruments.
A. A. telescope with wind component indicator.
A. A. observation instrument.
Speed computer.

The anti-aircraft director (Wilson type) being developed by the United States Army is classed as secret and no manufacturing details of the instrument can be released to your company.

Magazine Article Cited

Considerable data and information regarding the efficiency and performance of the new types of U. S. anti-aircraft material have been published. The article on anti-aircraft progress by Major G. M. Barnes, Ordnance Department, published in the March-April, 1927, issue of "Army Ordnance," is a very excellent resumé of the present status of anti-aircraft development in the United States and should serve as very good sales literature in convincing foreign governments of the efficiency of U. S. Army anti-aircraft artillery material.

Developments since the publication of this resumé about a year ago have been in the nature of refinements, all of which would be included in the design information furnished to your company.

In supplying design information to your company it should be understood that the War Department assumes no responsibility for the use of any patents, and that your company must assume full responsibility and liability for any patented features which you might make use of in the manufacture of this anti-aircraft material.

It is also manifest that the U.S. War Department can assume no responsibility for the correct functioning of any anti-aircraft material built by your company and sold to a foreign power, as the United States would have no supervision or jurisdiction over the manufacture, inspection, proof or test of these materials.

The War Department hopes that your company may be successful in obtaining an order for the manufacture of a considerable number of these new anti-aircraft materials of the latest U.S. Army design.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) C. B. ROBBINS.
The Asst. Sec. of War.

Policy Told to Turkey

In February of 1929, when the Driggs comany was negotiating for a contract with Turkey, Mr. Driggs communicated the policy of the department to H. F. L. Allen, who represented the company at Angora, and informed him that the facts were sent "for the confidential information of the Turkish Government."

He cautioned Mr. Allen to be careful "that our competitors do not make it the basis of misrepresentation of the American Government's position on the reduction of armaments question."

"If you have not already done so," Mr. Driggs added in his letter, "you should drive home the fact that this proves we are offering the Turkish Government the world's latest and best design in anti-aircraft material, upon the development of which the United States has spent over $2,000,000."

The navy did all it could to help the Driggs people get the Turkish order, testimony brought out, and the cruiser Raleigh steamed to Istanbul to demonstrate the effectiveness of the anti-aircraft guns carried in the batteries of that vessel.

Senator Nye expressed an opinion that this was "using the Raleigh as a sales ship" for private munitions makers.

The Colombian matter came next into the record. From the files of the Driggs company the committee produced in the form of reports the plans of Commander Strong for the defense of Colombia in the event of war with Peru. The plans were mainly for the safeguarding of the ports of Buenaventura and Tumaco, and the estimated cost of the construction was $2,000,000.

Letter on Colombian Matter

In a note to his Colombian representative, dated Nov. 4, 1932, Mr. Driggs wrote:

"In view of publicity attendant to the international situation between Colombia and Peru, the Colombian consulate here (New York) has been deluged with proposals for all kinds of war materials.

"To safeguard the interests of the Colombian Government and to save the time of the Colombian consulate and the War Ministry the United States Government has 'loaned' to the Colombia consulate one of its naval officers to act as an adviser on the merit of the materials offered. The officer in question is Commander James P. Strong."

Commander Strong subsequently resigned from the navy and entered the service of the Colombian Government as an adviser on military and naval affairs.

Much was made of the fact that "a little fling" the officer took in the stock market netted him a profit of $127. The stock was cashed in for him by Ingacio Miranda of New York, a brother of A. J. Miranda Jr., president of the American Armament Corporation, who until two years ago was connected with the Driggs company.

Mr. Miranda and other officials of the American Armament Corporation were called as witnesses after Mr. Driggs was excused. They testified they had done business with Bolivia, Cuba and Santo Domingo.

The Bolivian orders numbered six and called for arms and munitions priced at about $1,800,000, of which $800,000 worth have been delivered. Mr. Miranda and his associates were questioned for only a short time and will be recalled when the Committee resumes hearings Monday morning.

Congress Of Jews Is Voted For 1935

Group Accepts Condition That Election Of Delegates Be Thoroughly Democratic

GENEVA, Aug. 22.—The commission for the organization of a World Jewish Congress voted unanimously tonight to convoke the congress for August, 1935, at Geneva.

The commission accepted the condition laid down by the American delegates that the election of delegates to the congress should be thoroughly democratic. Therefore American members of the commission, including Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of New York, abandoned their opposition to calling the congress next year.

The commission will report tomorrow to the final plenary session of the world Conference of Jews, meeting here, which will then vote upon issuing formal convocations for the congress.

The American members of the commission had vigorously opposed setting the world assembly for 1935, demanding as the price of their favorable votes assurances that the delegates would not be hand-picked but would be truly representative of all sections of Jewry.

Long Discussion Likely

The commission for organization will report back to the plenary session of the world Jewish Conference at tomorrow's meeting. Leaders indicated that they expected a long discussion of the proposal to call the congress in 1935.

American delegates, including Rabbi Wise, had hoped that if the conference did convoke the congress it would do so without setting a definite date. The action of the organization committee, however, precluded this.

Rabbi Wise declined to make a statement concerning his opposition to calling the world conference, but it was understood that he felt the time would not be ripe. Some European delegates attributed his attitude to a division of opinion among Jews in America concerning the anti-German boycott and to difficulties that some Europeans thought might be encountered in getting all Jewish elements to cooperate in electing delegates.

Apprehension Is Allayed

Dr. S. Margoshes of New York said any European apprehension that American Jews would have difficulty in holding just and representative elections of congressional delegates was unfounded. He added that he and Rabbi Wise wanted to be sure that elections in Europe would be truly democratic.

It was expected that Americans would take a prominent part in preparing for the congress. American members will be added to an organization committee which will be the same otherwise as a committee of Jewish delegates created at the time of the peace conference.

The two committees will be merged, having one budget and probably receiving a new name. The present plan is to hold the congress in the large electoral building, where the Assemblies of the League of Nations meet, pending the opening of the new League of Nations Palace. It was considered possible that Jewish leaders might request the use of the new palace if it is completed in time.

Division Is Feared

Some delegates considered the cablegram of Samuel Untermyer, New York attorney, urging that the boycott against Nazi Germany be regarded as a broad moral issue affecting the whole world, as indicating a division among American Jews concerning the boycott.

In reply to Mr. Untermyer the conference expressed the hope that the American Boycott League, of which he is the president; the American Federation of Labor and the American Jewish Congress would "continue cooperating."

Tomorrow's plenary session closes the conference. Committees on the boycott representing various countries, among them the United States, will meet in London on Sept. 6 to set up a central bureau for supervising the boycott.

Heartened by reports that the German boycott was meeting with success in many countries—the United States, Great Britain, France, Belgium and Poland among others—the conference, through its subcommittee, prepared to give the move added breadth.

Central Office Urged

A center to direct world Jewry in its fight was one recommendation to the conferene. Among the more militant in the ranks of those urging a fight to the finish with Nazism was Rabbi Wise, who said in an interview earlier today that Teutonic paganism was making its last stand against religion. Christianity, civilization and democracy.

Expressing gratitude that Jews no longer stood alone, Rabbi Wise added:

"One cannot understand the German situation today if one imagines that Hitlerism is nothing more than a new outbreak of anti-Semitism."

The Jews are doomed because of their race, he added, "but millions of non-Jewish Germans, who are more truly Aryan than the Austrian Hitler, are doomed because of their political, economic and social views.

"We Jews are in the front line trenches," he concluded, after remarking the necessity for all races and all sects to stand together. "We are the Belgium of the latest German war against humankind. But the mighty army of Cristendom and civilization stands behind us and around us."

Gold Standard Rumored

Nippon Dempo

SHANGHAI, Sept. 29—It is rumored here that the National Government is preparing to adopt the gold standard as a means to cope with the situation arising from the American silver policy.

No shipment of gold has been reported to be made by the Central Bank of China since August, which is closely associated with the attitude of the National Government toward the gold standard.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

45,000,000 Americans Were Named After A Tree

The 45,000,000 Americans are the inhabitants of Brazil, whose area of 3,285,000 square miles makes it second only to Canada as the largest country in the western hemisphere. Brazil is larger than the United States, and is 65 times as large as England.

All this tremendous territory and its 45,000,000 inhabitants were named after the Brasil tree (Caesalpinia echinata) from whose wood dyers obtain a heavy red dye. The wood is called Brazil wood from the Portuguese word "braza" meaning "a live coal." The tree was found growing in what is now Brazil soon after the discovery of the New World. When a specimen of the wood was presented to King Manuel the Fortunate of Portugal, the King named the new territory "terra de Brazil" (the land of Brazil wood) and Brazil it has remained to this day.

A Put-Out Without Touching the Ball

The question is asked: "Can a ball player get two unassisted put-outs in one inning handling the ball only once?" And the answer is "Yes." In the Detroit-St. Louis game of July 4th, 1932, Burns of the St. Louis team tried to catch a foul, but the ball was snatched by a spectator who literally took the ball from Burns' glove. Burns, playing first base, then put out Gehringer and received credit for two put-outs though he touched the ball but once.

American Navy Awards Contracts For 24 Ships

velt explained that this was because no West Coast companies submitted bonds or satisfactry securities as required by law.

The construction of thirteen vessels by the Navy Department in government yards will be as follows:

Navy Yard, New York—One light cruiser.
Navy Yard, Philadelphia—One heavy cruiser.
Navy Yard, Portsmouth, N. H.—Two submarines.
Navy Yard, Boston—Two light destroyers.
Navy Yard, Puget Sound, Wash.—Two light destroyers.
Navy Yard, Norfolk—Three light destroyers.
Navy Yard, Mare Island, Calif.—One light destroyer and one submarine.

Private Yards Lose Destroyers

The law called for the construction of half of the program by private builders. This could not be done since no single bids had been submitted for destroyers that came within the limit of cost. This gave thirteen vessels to navy yards.

With the exception of the heavy cruiser, building can be undertaken promptly. The London treaty provides that the keel of the heavy cruiser, which will be built in the Philadelphia Navy Yard, cannot be laid until Jan. 1, 1935. This will be the last of the eighteen cruisers of this type allowed to the United States under the treaty.

Awards and allocations in all cases were made in accord with contract plans prepared by the department, except in the case of the two destroyers awarded to the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, for which designs were prepared by that company. These designs offer certain improvements over previous destroyers.

Building in Private Yards

Naval vessels now under construction in private yards are:

Newport News Shipbuilding Company—Yorktown and Enterprise, aircraft carriers.
Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Fore River, Mass.—Quincy (1933), Vincennes (1934), heavy cruisers; Phelps, Clark, Moffatt, Balch, destroyers.
New York Shipbuilding Corporation, Camden, N. J.—Savannah, Nashville, light cruisers; Porter, Selfridge, McDougal, Winslow, destroyers.
Bath Iron Works Corporation—Dewey, Drayton, Lamson, destroyers.
United Drydocks, Inc.—Mahon, Cummings, destroyers.
Federal Shipbuilding and Drydocks Company—Flusser, Reid, destroyers.
Electric Boat Company—Shark, Tarpon, submarines.

Building in Navy Yards

Ships under construction in navy yards are:

Portsmouth, N. H.—Porpoise and Pike, submarines.
Boston—MacDonough, Monaghan, Case, Conyngham, destroyers.
New York—Brooklyn, light cruiser; Hull, Dale, destroyers; Erie, gunboat.
Philadelphia—Philadelphia, light-cruiser; Aylwin, Cassin, Shaw, destroyers.
Norfolk—Tucker, Downes, destroyers.
Charleston—Charleston, gunboat.
Puget Sound—Worden, Cushing, Perkins, destroyers.
Mare Island—Smith, Preston, destroyers.

Vessels still permitted under the treaty are:

One aircraft carrier, 14,500 tons; two light cruisers, 17,100 tons; fifty-one destroyers, 77,635 tons, and twenty-four submarines, 27,740 tons.

Dr. Scherer Speaks

America was discovered by Asiatic immigrants who crossed over by the Bering sea some 2,000 years before Columbus arrived!

Dr. James A. B. Scherer so declared in addressing the Tokyo Women's club at its first fall meeting held Monday at the Y.W.C.A. Mrs. J. D. Hitch, Jr. presided.

Even from the Atlantic side, America was discovered 1,000 years before Columbus, Dr. Scherer contended. He declared that Columbus merely revealed America to Europe.

Mr. Scherer based his address on discoveries in which he participated in 1930 when he was president of the Southwest Museum of Los Angeles. That year, the museum sent Mark Harrington and a party of field archeologists to the Nevada desert where Harrington had already unearthed two lost cities. In addition, he had found in a cave near Boulder dam, a curious plebistocene animal known as the nothro-therium or ground sloth.

"Harrington's idea," Dr. Scherer said, "was that if we could definitely find pleistocene animals in Gypsum Cave, and then find associated with their remains objects of human make, or artifacts, we might definitely establish the approximate date of man's earliest arrival; that is, of the real discovery of America. That primeval man did not exist there seems negatively proved by the fact no trace of him has ever been found, as in Europe and Asia,—nor indeed of any true anthropoid. All the thousands of skulls exhumed and examined have been relatively recent, and of Mongoloid type. But when did these Mongolian immigrants, now known as the American Indians, come into man's New World?

"Harrington definitely proved that they were there before the ground-sloth, which apparently disappeared with the pleistocene age, that is, some 20,000 years ago. Gypsum Cave turned out to have been a regular ground-sloth lair. There had been two occupations, separated by an immense time, as proved by two thick layers of unquestionable nothro-therium manure, separated by some seven feet of undisturbed rock. Down under the lower deposit was found an equally unquestionable camp-fire! Elsewhere were huge numbers of broken atlatl, a weapon which antedated the bow-and-arrow by thousands of years, with many other primitive artifacts.

"Thus man's arrival in America was set back thousands of years. He came bringing with him only a dog and the most primitive Stone Age equipment. He came not in any large numbers at any one time, but in driblets, drifting along the line of least resistance farther and farther southward until in the warm tropical regions of Mexico and Central America he found living conditions easy, and there settled down. There agriculture developed, giving him leisure from the chase. Basketry was invented, always the earliest of the arts, and afterward—through many centuries—all the equipment of a great civilization. Columbus and those who succeeded him found rich cities with magnificent architecture and in many respects a higher reach of the arts and even of science than existed in Europe. But, alas! It has been wittily said of these newcomers that they fell first upon their knees and then upon the aborigines. As a great scholar has put it, 'it is the tragedy of native American history that so much human effort has come to naught, and that so many hopeful experiments in life and in living were cut short by the devastating blight of the white man's arrival.'"

War In Far East Held Unlikely By Walter Duranty

Writer Believes There Are Too Many Obstacles For Campaign

The question of peace or war between Russia and Japan depends not only upon racial, political and social antagonism, nor yet upon the issues of tortuous Oriental diplomacy, says Walter Duranty in the New York Times.

There are such practical considerations as the comparative strength of the forces that the two countries can bring into action and the means of keeping them supplied and reinforced—that is, roads, railroads and rivers—and last, but not least weather, or the Russians' ancient alley, "General Winter."

Despite indignation over the Chinese Eastern Railway dispute and maltreatment of Soviet nationals in Manchukuo, the Soviet Government does not want war and will not fight unless the Japanese invade Soviet territory.

Japanese See Threat

From the Japanese point of view, however—especially the Japanese military point of view—the Soviet Far Eastern army and its bombing planes constitute a permanent threat to Japan. The fact that the Soviet Union would never have assembled such a force in the Far East if Japan had not invaded Manchoukuo means nothing to Japanese soldiers—that is "water over the dam" to them.

Quite recently in Moscow the Japanese proposed to minimize this threat by the establishment of a demilitalized zone between Manchukuo and Soviet Siberia, which immediately would weaken the Soviet capacity for defense. The Soviet Union cannot accept this, and, therefore, the threat will continue to exist in the Japanese military mind.

The chief question is whether the Japanese military mind fears this threat sufficiently to attempt to eliminate it by war. That there is a powerful war party in Japan goes without saying, but whether it can have its way is another story.

The writer believes it cannot—that the difficulties of a campaign against the Soviet Union are no less than the civilian fears as to the issue of such a conflict and that the civilian view would prevail over military hot-headedness.

The Soviet Union has today a strong and efficient force of perhaps 200,000 men, based mainly on the Chita-Daria sector in the west and the Vladivostok-Khabarovsk sector in the east. They are well equipped with supplies, artillery, tanks and about 1,000 airplanes, plus 150,000 reservists on collective farms, which may or may not be fortified.

The Soviet frontier is undoubtedly fortified with cannon, concrete and steel. These forces are on the outer fringe of the huge salient which Manchukuo forms toward Soviet territory, but there is an additional factor that its extreme right end—namely, Vladivostok—is less than 500 miles by plane from the Japanese wood-and-paper cities, which could be destroy in a single windy night by thermite flame bombs.

Japanese Build Roads

However, the Japanese are building roads and railroads up to and along the Soviet borders. The Japanese, moreover—although their present forces in Manchuria are probably inferior to the Soviet total—would be able rapidly to send reinforcements from Japan, whereas it would be much harder for the Soviet Union to augment the Far Eastern army and keep it supplied.

In the event of war the Trans-Siberian Railroad, which is the main Soviet artery, doubtless would be speedily cut. The Russians could cut outlying Japanese communications, but they would find it less easy to prevent a flow of men and supplies to the Japanese front.

Against that the Japanese would have two grave difficulties—first, hostility of the Manchoukuoan population, and, second, a vast area and a comparative lack of roads and railroads, which would be complicated during most of the year by unfavorable weather.

In point of fact, the only season when a big scale, modern campaign would be possible in Manchukuo is Winter, which freezes rivers, marshes and water courses and makes transport possible. The Japanese are unsuited to Winter warfare—they had terrible casualties from frostbite alone at the "battle" of Nonni Rier two years ago—whereas the Red Army is used to ice and snow.

Communications a Problem

On paper it looks easy for the Japanese to throw two or three million men into Manchoukuo and swamp a comparatively small Russian army, which could not be greatly reinforced. In practice the Japanese would find it extremely difficult to maintain front-line troops to the number of 500,000 in a hostile country with poor communications, as the British found in the South African war.

The Russians would fight stubbornly, and they would raid Japan with planes and Japanese Manchukuo with planes and guerrilla attacks. The final decision would be determined by the ability of the Russians to get supplies and men and by Japanese ability to continue the gigantic siege—for it would be nothing else than that—until the Russian garrison was exhausted.

Those are the facts of the case as seen, not, perhaps, by military experts in Paris, London or Washington, but by men who know Manchoukuo. Among these latter there are Japanese, and they must understand how great is the risk.

Of course there is always a danger of hothead action that may provoke a conflict, but the odds today, in the writer's opinion, are against a war between Russia and Japan in the near future.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The New Rice Writing Champion

From far away Tokyo, Japan, comes Hirohei Homma who recently made a new world's record of 3021 letters written on a single grain of rice. Homma, unlike other rice writers who are continually viewing for a new record, writes only with a Japanese writing brush—not a steel pen—and though he always works without a microscope, his work can be correctly read only with the aid of a strong magnifying glass.

In his native country, Homma specializes in calling cards and name plates for Japanese men-of-affairs, and came to my attention as an outstanding artist for the 1934 World's Fair, where he now works daily at his chosen task.

Scow Loaded With Stones Will Not Sink

From Ed Lundquist, veteran tug boat operator of Detroit, comes the story that a scow loaded with round stones will not sink if it springs a leak. The explanation is that the leak would partly fill the scow with water, causing the scow to list sufficiently to allow the stones to roll overboard. Then the high side of the load would become the heaviest and it would roll the other way, dumping almost the entire load, and the scow would only sink to the water's edge.

Mr. Lundquist reports that this has actually happened to scowloads of stones behind his tugboat.

Man Who Fell 250 Miles

Ralph Voorhis of Grantwood, N. J., makes a profession of parachute jumping and during his hazardous career has made more than 300 "delayed" openings—falling from 500 to 10,000 feet toward the earth before opening the chute. The average for all delayed opening jumps is 5,000 feet, and totalling them all up, Voorhis has fallen plummet-like through space for more than 250 miles while the parachute has still been neatly packed on his back.

100,000 Quail For US To Be Supplied By Mexico

is maintained for the birds, and who must keep the area free of animals that prey on quail. Game laws, of course, prohibit hunting within any sanctuary.

Establishment of these refuges involved several problems for the commission, according to Mr. Gentry, originator of the plan. In some instances the commissioners were called upon toplay the part of engineers, in order to provide water and proper living conditions for the imported birds.

Live in Sanctuaries

"Two major requirements presented themselves once negotiations for importing Mexican quail were completed," Mr. Gentry said. "One was to locate these sanctuaries where living conditions were similar to those whence the quail were taken, and the other was to provide adequate water once he birds were planted. Conditions must be such that quail will breed and increase until food conditions force the surplus out of the sanctuaries and into open area adjoining.

"The imported quail come from the area back of San Quentin, an arid region of Baja California. Fortunately, there are considerable sections of southern California almost identical both physically and climatically with Baja California—dry, brushy areas—and here sanctuaries were located. It is doubtful if Mexican quail would be successful north of geographical southern California. Farther north climatic conditions is so different from those in Baja California raise serious question whether the imported birds would survive.

"Water presented a more serious problem. One of the most interesting phases of this Mexican quail project is that the Fish and Game Commission has not alone planted quail but has developed water on the sanctuaries. Where water cannoot be supplied by wells or ditches, it is hauled in. The fact that the commission foresaw this need and made adequate provision is significant now, with serious drought conditions existing.

Tatsumi Battery

New Electric Battery And Dynamo Marketed

Wet Battery Runs This Hand Lamp

A small electric battery, wet instead of dry, which only needs the addition of a small amount of water once in a while and which sells for only 4 sen has been placed on the market by a Japanese firm. It is claimed by the manufacturers that this new battery—the "Tatsumi"—will last almost indefinitely and hence will do away with the ordinary dry cells in use on hand electric lamps, etc.

In addition, a new "Tatsumi" dynamo has been made by the same firm. The dynamo is small and may be installed anywhere for the running of light machinery. It is thought that this dynamo will be of great use to households, household industry and in rural districts. The small dynamo sells for only one yen.

European Dictators Are Preparing For Struggle

Prague and Belgrade.

If the Little Entente actually turns to Berlin, there will be not a few Frenchmen who will rejoice because in Paris there has been a growing anxiety about the costs and risks of the French attempt to uphold the status quo in all of Central Europe. Already responsibility for the status quo in the Polish Corridor has been removed and now Mussolini has taken over the Austrian responsibility. If trouble comes now on the Danube it will be Italy who will have to turn to France and not visa versa as it has been until recently.

On the other hand, relations between Paris and London are likely to become closer as French commitments in the center and east of Europe diminish. London, Paris and Rome may, too, expand that working agreement which they visibly have reached already on the Austrian issue. The Soviet union will certainly be ready to make a common front with these three nations as far as Germany is concerned. Thus, Hitler is unlikely to accomplish much politically in any early time.

But to imagine that the union of Austria with Germany can be permanently prevented is a mistake. The real problem now is not to prevent such union, which has become well nigh inevitable, but to postpone it until Hitler has fallen. Otherwise the Anschluss might serve as a victory sufficient to perpetuate the National Socialist regime, the fall of which is now equally desired in the capitals of all four great powers. On the other hand no attack is likely to be launched at Germany, now that none of the great powers feels immediately threatened by German events or armaments.

France and Britain Will Support Mussolini

Mussolini, for a brief moment, is then in a position to speak for Europe. He has Italy in his hand. France will support him against Germany by force and Britain at least financially if it comes to a real crisis. To him belongs the credit for having solved the immediate Austrian crisis precipitated by the murder of Dollfuss by a swift mobilization and by an equally sagacious avoidance unnecessarily provocative action. Under the menace of 100,000 Italian troops actually at the frontier, Hitler threw over the Nazi cause in Austria and his Austrian agents and lieutenants are now facing firing squads and decorating gallows.

It may be that there will be another crisis before winter comes. The whole central European situation is filled with dynamite. What is more likely is a fresh period of pause. The real drama now lies inside of Germany, not outside. If Hitler can last this winter out he may be in a position to resume his Austrian adventure in the spring. His best game is to continue his professions of peaceful intent abroad and of desire for reconciliation at home. Abroad if no one is likely to believe him neither is anyone likely to resort to drastic measures.

Mussolini, like Hitler, is now faced with a supreme crisis. He can and probably will call the tune for European events for some time to come. But while he has courage and force, he speaks for a country with small resources alike in money and raw materials. A foreign war, however successful, would be a dangerous gamble if it brought in its wake new depression and further domestic privation. He must, then, direct events in such fashion as to vindicate his authority without having to strain his resources.

His greatest danger comes from Jugoslavia. The Serbs are notoriously hostile to Italy, resentful of all the grievances which go back to the Fiume episode. Their internal situation is such that a foreign war might prove the surest single means of reuniting the Croat, the Slovene and the Serb. The recent dispatch of an Italian fleet to Durazzo as a warning to Albania had a direct Jugoslav implication and the threat was not mistaken in Belgrade. A border incident could precipitate a war overnight and such a war would bestow a heaven-sent opportunity upon Hitler.

Obviously a new situation is evolving. It is hardly likely to crystallize until the outcome of Hitler's battle with hunger and cold—with unemployment and undernourishment—has been fought and won or lost. If this battle is lost, then the downfall of the National Socialist regime in the reich must have immediate repercussions all over middle Europe—first of all in Vienna, where Mussolini's only effective ally is his foe, Hitler.

The Serb started the last war and he may start the next. His actions are unpredictable. His hostility to Italy is incurable. Rather than let Italy establish any permanent system in the Danubian area the Serbs would fight now. But they can afford to wait. They believe as does everybody else in central Europe that Austro-German union is inevitable in the long run and that at best Mussolini can only postpone it. They expect to find an ally in Germany when the Anschluss takes place. Meantime when Italy mobilizes Jugoslavia follows suit.

What is the oddest of all contemporary circumstances is the fact that it is within the realms of possibility that we may one day see Czech, Serb, Italian and German armies all racing for Vienna as the Greek, Serb and Bulgarian armies raced for Salonica in the first Balkan war in 1912. And just which of the four armies would fraternize remains a deep secret. Only two things are clear: first, that the Germans and Italians would fight and second, that the Serbs in such a case would back the Germans.

As I have said, we are probably about to see a long winter truce. But next spring, if both the duce and the fuehrer have survived—and with the duce the question is not political—then Europe may see a duel unparalleled since Napoleon and Czar Alexander, having similarly enjoyed a brief friendship, quarreled and embarked upon the struggle which saw the old guard in Moscow and shortly thereafter witnessed the entrance of the Cossacks into Paris.

Fletcher Assails Richberg Report To US President

He Calls 'Losses' In Them A 'New Deal Liability'—Sees Jobs Fewer, Wages Lower

Henry P. Fletcher, chairman of the Republican National Committee, hit back recently at the Richberg report to President Roosevelt on the results achieved by the NRA, says a Washington dispatch to the New York Times.

Mr. Fletcher asserted that the "American economic system," which he said New Dealers call "outworn, impotent and inequitable," had "functioned magnificently" from April to August of 1933, and brought to President Roosevelt's "average man," earning his living in industry, agriculture or business, "a greater degree of real prosperity than he has enjoyed since, without producing industrial unrest, suspicion and warfare."

He said that the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar was represented by an index of 71 in 1933, against only 66 in July, 1934, and that industrial production, except automobiles, had declined in all classifications of the Department of Commerce.

Remarking that Mr. Richberg had omitted strike statistics from his resume, he asserted that strikes had caused "terrific economic losses."

Conditions Under Recovery Acts

Referring to Mr. Richberg's comparisons of present conditions and those in the Spring and early Summer of last year, Mr. Fletcher said:

"Comparisons given out by the New Deal should start at scratch. The twin recovery measures—namely, the AAA and the NRA—did not become effective until July, 1933. The National Industrial Recovery Act was not approved by the President until June 16, and it was July before the NRA was in working order.

"To ascertain just what the benefits of the New Deal have been, comparisons must be made with conditions as they were when these two measures became effective and what they are today.

"Such a comparison shows that, during the period since these two outstanding so-called recovery measures became effective business activity has declined, private construction has declined, car loadings have declined.

"The greatest decline in car loadings has been in general merchandise, coal and coke, ore and forest products. Due to the drought compelling farmers to rush their stock either to market or to new pasturage, and market what little grain they had, car loadings of these two classes have shown an increase. That is an evidence of distress and not of prosperity."

Discussing what he said was the decline in production, Mr. Fletcher continued:

"This includes coal, electric power, lumber, petroleum and steel. The index number of production of automobiles Aug. 18, 1934, was 70.6, as against 70.7 Aug. 9, 1933. Cotton consumption and textile production have declined; pig iron, boot and shoe, silk and zinc production all have declined."

Employment Figures Disputed

Mr. Fletcher quoted the American Federation of Labor's statistical department as estimating unemployment today as 300,000 greater than in October, 1933, and the total number of unemployed industrial workers as about 10,000,000.

"According to the report of the Department of Labor, the slump in industrial employment in July this year was the greatest in fifteen years," he went on.

"According to the same authority, the amount of per capita weekly wage earnings in industries has increased 8.5 per cent, while the cost of living during the same period has increased 9. per cent, so that, on the whole, industrial workers are getting less 'real' wages today than they were a year ago.

"The bulk of the improvement noted in the Richberg report took place before July, 1933—before any of the so-called 'New Deal' emergency measures had been enacted and put in effect.

"Government figures issued by departments under the 'New Deal' show that, upon the return of public confidence in April, 1933, following the bank panic, there was continuous improvement in practically every field of business untill the first week in August, when the deadening effects of the so-called Recovery measures began to take effect.

"The recovery in this country between April and August, 1933, was very rapid. Prices of farm products went up, the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar went up, industrial wages, freigh-car loadings, department store sales, private building construction, imports and exports steadily increased.

"Many of these activities reached a point in the latter part of July or the first week in August, 1933, which has not been equaled since then."

Mr. Fletcher took up the question of strikes.

"Despite the very intimate relationship between strikes, industrial production and employments, strike statistics are conspicuously absent from Mr. Richberg's report," he said.

"Perhaps he is merely waiting until after Sept. 1, when, in event the textile strike is called, his figures will be more up to date. In any event, his next report should have a detailed account of the terrific economic losses which have been occsioned in the past twelve months by strikes.

"This should include not only the loss in hours of labor and wages of the strikers, but the losses inflicted upon other workers in industry, upon industry itself, upon the farmers, business and commerce.

Figures have been given from time to time that the larger strikes of the past few months have occasioned losses running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, thrown thousands of innocent working men out of employment, deprived agriculture of access to its markets and completely paralyzed the commercial activities of many of our larger cities.

Radio Control In England And U.S. Differ Greatly

been sold in the United States, that some homes now possess more than one set, and that there has been an extraordinary increase in automobile radios with no equivalent development in Great Britain thus far, yet it is a fact that with three times the per capita number of telephones in America, a huge superiority in motorcar possession, and a per capita wealth that leads the world, one would have supposed that radio sets would have shown a corresponding lead.

British receiving sets cost more than American sets, and each owner must, as already noted, pay an nual tax of $2.50. If, in the face of all this, British set ownership approximates American ownership, then certainly the British public must be getting something from wireless broadcasting that it values very much indeed.

Advertising

British programs cost much less than American programs and the complaint heard here is that American advertisers are taking away all the best radio talent.

The testimony of English commentators speaks for itself. A great many Americans who have listened to British programs feel that in the mechanics of presentation at least, and particularly in what might be called that "first line" programs, the New World is ahead of the Old, with a greater imagination, audacity (witness the Byrd Christmas broadcast from Little America) and opulence in gathering stellar performers. This is less true in the average day to day broadcasts.

One striking contrast the two countries certainly present, and this is in their respective approaches to controversial topics on the air. It is here that the quasi-governmental connection of radio in Great Brittain finds its greatest difficulty.

Whatever side of a controversy it presents it is exposed to criticism and attack and consequently it has adopted what strikes the American at first as a conservative and timid policy. In the United States almost anybody can get on the air who pays for it; and in a political election all the big speeches of the rival parties are carried as a matter of course. Nobody "tones down" American politics for the listener and aside from respecting certain elementary decencies the speaker can say about what he pleases.

Controversial Topics

In England on the other hand, as late as March, 1928, an absolute ban existed on all controversial subjects. Down to the present day the American manner of broadcasting all big political events and addresses hardly finds its equivalent in the B. B. C. practice of presenting alternate spokesmen of respective parties in specially prepared addresses with the advance instructions to drop platform tactics for the fireside demeanor.

The British policy has been to give equal opportunity to the government and to the opposition, which has meant that, because of the three-party system, the government actually received twice as much time as any other party, and always having the last word.

How the party out of office in America at any time would rage at giving the inevitable last word to the "ins."

This paternalistic attitude of moderating the heat of political debate and giving the government the final word is only one phase of a very definite policy of the B. B. C., that is, to give the public not so much what it wants, as what it wants plus what is good for it.

Political Debate

Though Americans may find it hard to agree to the wisdom of any limit on political debate, there are some aspects of this policy of a less controversial nature. The B. B. C. is definitely committed to exercising control of broadcasting for cultural and national betterment. There is no profit motive to reduce programs to the lowest common denominator of jazz rhythm. While dance music is given, and plenty of it, Sir John Reith, the B. B. C. director general, assumes the conscious objective of offering less frivolity than the average person might desire.

The B. B. C. is definitely attempting to develop the nation's appreciation of good music and education. Radio is looked upon as a public trust, with incalculable power of affecting public policy, national tastes and the outlook of the younger generation. It is felt that the potentialities are too big to let the profit motive enter into them. The B.B.C. is a semi-autonomous corporation, but this civic sense is enunciated again and again by Sir John.

He proceeds on the assumption that "a supply of good things creates a demand."

British Imitated

So far as imitation goes nearly all countries outside of the United States have followed the British example of imposing license fees; and the B. B. C. has proved a popular model for imitation on the European Continent in the British Dominions generally and in Japan, while even in Canada a national system on this model has been undertaken, although permissive advertising limited to 50 per cent of any single program has been retained, on the theory that Canadian industries might otherwise suffer in competition with radio advertising of United States products across the border.

British radio pratice also differs markedly from American in treatment of news. The B. B. C. subscribes to all four big news agencies serving England and gives extensive summaries of their dispatches, while the American companies have recently cut down their news summaries in deference to protests of newspaper "competitors."

In England, no ill effect seems to have been suffered by newspapers because of these "rival" broadcasts, the first of which lasts half an hour, and they are a highly valued feature of the programs. So far as newspapers go, the British radio now seems to give the news without advertising, while American radio very largely gives the advertising without the news.

British Financing

British broadcasting suffers from lack of funds, the more so since a considerable percentage of its license fee money is diverted into the national treasury, just as gasoline taxes in the United States find their way into state exchequers rather than into better roads. The B. B. C. recoups some of this in its virtual monopoly of publications dealing with radio. These include its leaflets on extension courses, discussions of "broadcasting English," and the like. In addition, it publishes two widely circulated radio magazines. Its total printing reaches enormous proportions.

So much, then, for the contrasting British and American systems. Which one of them is better?

Obviously, to a considerable degree, the answer depends on personal choice. Mr. William Hard, American publicist and broadcaster, declares that the European system attempts to advance culture but not civics, while the American is advancing civics but not culture.

Personal Conclusions

The compiler of the B. B. C. Year Book for 1933 agrees in general with Mr. Hard's epigram. He says, "When allowance is made for the oversharpness of the generalization, the proposition as stated would be very difficult to confute."

The writer wants to speak a final word on his own account, in conclusion.

I possess a radio of my own; I am no highbrow; but many and many a night in America I have shut down the expensive equipment in despair over the type of jazz and "crooning" offered at every point on the dial. There are tens of thousands of others like me. The culmination of a magnificent piece of music by an advertisement of bath salts or cigarettes is an anomaly to which repetition does not lend attractiveness, and the interruption of a program to give such an advertisement is even worse.

British broadcasting may not reach the heights, but certainly it stays above the depths of American broadcasting; and it is motivated throughout by a sense of profound moral responsibility. I do object to government in broadcasting, but I object even more to cigarette advertisements in broadcasting. I believe that the American treatment of controversial matters is definitely superior to the British treatment; but on other matters I would make almost any concession to get my radio entertainment free of commercial dross.

Jungle Power

In my travels I have always noted that bearing towards the tropics man becomes weaker and nature becomes stronger, and in some parts of the world even the great created forces of man are constantly threatened with destruction by the powerful forces of nature—that heavy growth of trees, vines, underbrush, and tentacle-like roots of the jungle. No more striking illustration of this great power of the jungle exists, on a small scale, than the one near San Pablo, Panama, where a heavy steel dump car has been pierced by a jungle tree, the roots and limbs of which have almost completely enveloped the car, growing through the body of the car, around the wheels and axles, and over the sides in a death grip that will never be broken until the great tree itself is dissolved in the undergrowth.

Mr. Kojiro Tomita, Director of the Oriental Section of the Boston Art Institute, returned here aboard the N.Y.K. liner Hikawa Maru from the United States on a brief visit to his mother country and China yesterday afternoon, after having been absent from Japan for 27 years.

He was accompanied by his American wife, Mrs. Harriet Tomita. Graduating from the Kyoto School of Arts when he was 17 years of age, he entered the service of the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce and was sent to the United States as a training student of the Ministry. He studied fine art under the guidance of the late Mr. Kakuzo Okakura, who was at that time director of the Oriental Section of the Boston Art Institute.

Upon the death of his teacher, Mr. Tomita stepped into Mr. Okakura's shoes and for 27 years has been connected with the Boston museum. Upon being interviewed by the press, the Japanese said that the study of Japanese fine art is becoming increasingly popular in the United States that nowadays, a professor of arts who is without the knowledge of Oriental arts does not deserve his profession.

He told that he was intending to stay in Japan for two months during which he will visit his parents' tomb in Kyoto and study the tendency of Japan's fine arts.

Mr. and Mrs. Tomita intend to visit China, India and Siam before returning to the United States.

Ellsworth To Start For Antarctic Soon

Explorer Due To Sail Shortly For Deception Island

Dr. Lincoln Ellsworth, leader of the Transantarctic Flight Expedition, arrived in Dunedin on Sept. 14 to supervise the arrangements for his second expedition to the South Polar regions. His vessel, the motor ship Wyatt Earp, should be ready to sail for Deception Island within a few days, says a report to the New York Times.

Last year Dr. Ellsworth left Dunedin Dec. 5 and proceeded to the Bay of Whales in the Ross Sea, where, after successful tests with his high-speed airplane, the Polar Star, the machine was so badly damaged by the break-up of the ice that it had to be returned to the factory in California for repairs.

The airplane is once more aboard the Wyatt Earp, and this year, in order to take advantage of the better weather early in the season and in an attempt to cover an even greater area of unknown Antarctica than he planned to cover last year, Dr. Ellsworth will make his base at Deception Island, about 800 miles south of Cape Horn. From that base he hopes to fly via the Weddell Sea to the Ross Sea early in November.

On the Wyatt Earp will be the same crew as last year, with the exception of the medical officer, Dr. Reals Berg, who has been replaced by Dr. Francis D. Coman of the staff of Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore.

Labor Service In Germany May Be Compulsory

Hitler Gives Hint In Address To 52,000 Volunteers At Nuremberg Rally

The parade and "goose-stepping" of 52,000 labour volunteers and an announcement by Herr Hitler, which is believed to foreshadow imminent compulsory labour service, were two striking incident of the Nazi Party rally at Nuremberg last month, says the Times, London.

The announcement or, perhaps more accurately, the hint of compulsory legislation, was given by Herr Hitler at a gathering of members of the Voluntary Labor Corps on the Zeppelinwiese recently. "The day will come," he said, "when service will be no longer a matter of free choice," and although the statement seems vague Herr Hitler has previously announced important measures in terms hardly more definite. The former Nationalist organ, the Frankischer Kurier, which is believed to the well informed in this respect, claims that it has good ground for fixing the date of a compulsory measure as January 1, 1935.

Today the gathering of 52,000 members of the Labour Corps was the first of several highly spectacular displays, which will be the prominent feature of the present rally. The large meadow on the outskirts of the town was banked on two sides by long rows of benches filled with spectators. A third side was occupied by a high wooden stand, surmounted by an enormous metal eagle marked with the swastika, and lavishly draped with Nazi banner. This was reserved for the Fuhrer, Dr Goebbels, Herr Darre, Dr. Frank, General von Blomberg, Admiral Raeder, the Head of the Admiralty, and other naval and military officers, leaders.

"Goose-step" March

Facing this stand, and occupying about one-sixth of the whole area of the meadow, the members of the corps were drawn up in rank and file. This is the first time that the Labour Corps have made a public appearance in large numbers, and their appearance and bearing must have come as a surprise to many Germans, as well as to the foreign spectators. They wore smart greyish-green uniforms, each man being equipped with a spade. It was a picturesque sight when, at the word of command, this vast "labour army" shouldered their spades as one man and stood at attention with the sunlight gleaming on a forest of steel blades. But the spectators seemed even more impressed when a long column emerged from a lane dividing the two main formations and performed the "goose-step" march so famous in the German Regular Army. Representatives of the various contingents from all parts of the country stepped out of the ranks and announced the name of the districts from which their unit was drawn, among them being the Saar.

After the hosts had sworn an oath of allegiance to the Fuhrer and Chancellor, Herr Hierl, leader of the Labour Corps, standing face to face with Herr Hitler on the platform, assured him that every man of the 180,000 members of the Labour Corps was as devoted as the 52,000 who stood before him.

Respect for Labour

In a brief address to the gathering Herr Hitler, who wore the S.A. and Sam Browne belt, emphasized (Brownshirts) uniform with tunic the vital importance of labour in the Nazi scheme of society.

We know (he said) that our national community cannot be maintained as long as the old ideas of class distinction survive in our people. It is therefore necessary to cultivate respect for labour in a world of mammonist and selfish thought. It is a great undertaking to teach a whole people a new conception of work. We have dared to undertake this and we shall succeed; you furnish the first testimony that we cannot fail. The whole nation must pass through the same school as you. The day will come when no German can be a fully qualified citizen who has not passed through the communal life of your camps.

This afternoon the 52,000 members of the Labour Corps paraded through the streets of Nuremberg, finally marching past Herr Hitler in the historic market square, which now bears his name. The Fuhrer stood in an open motor-car at the foot of a tribune providing seats for 1,000 and greeted the columns, which took two hours to pass by, with outstretched arm.

Herr Hitler will tomorrow review the political organization of the Nazi Party (the functionaries), and is expected to make a speech, which it is thought, will be the most important of the rally.

Lloyd's Register First Appeared A Century Ago

Annual Report Shows Steady Improvement In Shipping For Past Two Years

The annual report of Lloyd's Register of Shipping for 1933-34 states this year the society will celebrate the centenary of its reconstitution on its present basis. Although the origin of the institution dated earlier, the Register did not appear until October 21, 1834, as a society representative of underwriters, merchants, and shipowners, says The Times, London. It may be pointed out that there are now represented on the Committee marine underwriters of syndicates and insurance companies, shipbuilders, and marine engineers. Referring to 1834 the report proceeds:—

Then for the first time the classification of merchant ships was placed upon a sound basis, and the Committee feel that they may look back with pardonable pride upon the progress the society has made during the past 100 years, and upon the high place it has attained in the confidence of the various maritime communities throughout the world.

Describing the year under review, the report states:—

"The unparalleled depression in shipping, which has characterized the last few years, has still continued to baffle the efforts of the ablest and most experienced shipowners to operate their ships at a reasonable profit, or even, in many cases, to avoid a serious loss. The position of the tramp shipowners, suffering under the accumulated effects of a succession of bad years, became so serious that British shipowners were led to appeal for Government aid in the shape of a subsidy. The adjustment and application of the subsidy, which has been approved by the British Government, is still the subject of discussion between the owners and the Board of Trade, so that it is not possible at the moment to say what effect this may have on the general position.

Less Tonnage Idle

"One impotrant factor which may, however, be mentioned is the continued, if somewhat slow, reduction in the amount of world tonnage laid up unemployed. Two years ago the figure stood at 15,000,000 tons; a year ago at 12,000,000 tons; and now it stands at 8,000,000 tons. Even this amount of tonnage, however, forms a terrible dead-weight on the freight market, although quite an appreciable proportion of it is not only unemployed, but economically unemployable under existing conditions. Efforts continue to be made to get rid of redundant tonnage by means of breaking up; and it appears that from June, 1933, to the present date the total tonnage has been reduced by 2,700,000 tons, which have been sold for breaking up purpose.

"The result is that the world's tonnage, which in 1914 amounted to 49,000,000 tons, and had by 1931 grown to 70,000,000 tons, has now shrunk to 65,000,000 tons. This total is still in excess of the demand of he freight market, but the gradual elimination of surplus vessels which is going on opens up a more hopeful vista for shipowners than was apparent a year ago and still more than two years ago.

"In face of the existing conditions, it may not be amiss to recall the fact that, in the course of the last hundred years of the society's history, shipping has experienced several periods of severe depression; but, as time has shown, these periods eventually passed and were succeeded by years of great activity and prosperity. This encourages the hope that, with the steps now being taken to relieve the conditions which bear so heavily upon shipowners in general and tramp shipowners in particular, we may again, in the near future, see a return to a reasonable measure of prosperity for merchant shipping.

"With regard to shipbuilding, it will be observed that the increased activity recently experienced has been of a rather limited character, having been confined chiefly to passenger liners, oil tankers, and vessels intended for special services. During the 12 months ended June 30, 1934, the society's classification was assigned to 192 new vessels, of 350,439 tons gross. Although this total is the lowest upon record, it represents approximately 64 per cent of the world tonnage completed during the period. The proportion of ships built in this country was again comparatively small. Of the amount quoted above, only 136,072 tons were constructed in Great Britain and Ireland, the remaining 214,358 tons being built abroad."

Plans of New Vessels

The number of plans submitted during the year ended June 30, 1934, of new vessels intended to be classed by the Committee of the Register showed a substantial increase over the figure for the previous 12 months—namely, 242 vessels, of 804,819 tons gross, compared with 142 vessels, of 323,600 tons gross, for 1932-33. Of this contemplated tonnage 53 per cent. (namely, 169 vessels, of 426,230 tons) is intended for construction in Great Britain and Ireland, the remaining 47 per cent. (73 vessels, of 378,580 tons) being for construction abroad. Since last June plans have been approved by the Committee for a further 30 vessels, of 58,810 tons gross.

Among the larger vessels—of over 20,000 ton gross—under construction to the society's classification there are mentioned the "quadruplescrew express steamer No. 534," being built by John Brown and Co., for the Cunard White Star, Limited; a twin-screw passenger steamer being built by Vickers-Armstrongs, Limited, for the Orient Steam Navigation Company; and one being built by the same company for the P. and O. Steam Navigation Company; and two twinscrew passenger motor-vessels under construction by Harland and Wolff, Limited, for the Union Castle Mail Steamship Company.

Through a North Sea Storm in a Barrel

The flair to accomplish to bizarre and impossible is everpresent in the people of all nations—walking across continents, sailing oceans alone, or being buried alive for weeks at a time. A new and curious stunt, which just came to my attention from Rotterdam, was undertaken in May when Hein Schilperoort built a boat out of an ordinary barrel, equipped it with sails, and then set out for England. Sailing from Schiedam the daring sailor had good luck until he reached Hook of Holland, where he was enveloped in a severe North Sea storm for 24 hours, finally landing at the harbor of Scheveningen, 40 miles from his port of departure, thankful to have come through the ordeal with his life.

Bryan's numerous publishing ventures took him through almost all departments of newspaper work—reporter, advertising salesman, linotype operator, printer, pressman, stereotyper, engraver—and Believe It or Not he was discharged only four times.

Bryan at present makes his home in Excelsior Springs, Mo.

That Film on Teeth!

The source of many tooth troubles

Why Teeth Discolor and Decay

THE trouble lies in the slimy, ever-present film which you can feel with your tongue.

That film is where the stains lodge, dimming the beauty of your teeth. That film is what combines with other substances to harden into tartar.

That film is what holds food particles. There they shortly decay and form acid. This acid, authorities believe, is the chief cause of tooth decay.

Therefore, the great need is a tooth paste to remove that film—and Pepsodent has supplied it. Pepsodent is called the special film-removing tooth paste. When you use it, you will know the reason.

Pepsodent's effectiveness in removing film is due to a special cleansing and polishing material. Its object is to remove film—safely, thoroughly. Some cleansing materials remove film but scratch enamel. Others are safe but too soft to be effective. So to be sure that you are removing film safely and effectively, use Pepsodent—the special film-removing tooth paste.

Salzburg Cheers Toscanini Wildly

First Of His Three Concerts At Festival Stirs Audience To Frantic Acclaim

Arturo Toscanini has graduated from Baireuth to Salzburg. He made his first appearance in this town tonight, conducting the Vienna Philharfonic in a classical program and at the close of the evening even he, to whom triumphs are as commonplaces in the daily lives of ordinary men, must have been shaken by the intensity of the demonstration with which a frenzied gathering acclaimed him. It seemed as if the cumulative enthusiasms of the entire festival were concentrated into those few moments, according to a Salzburg dispatch to the New York Times on August 28 by Herbert F. Payser.

The conductor returned repeatedly to the stage to bow, with gestures that seemed to express something between entreaty and self-depreciation. He made the players rise, as he had done several times earlier in the concert, only to see them join in the tumult of applause. When he found there was no other way of calming the tempest, he signalled the orchestra to leave and vanished in the confusion of the dispersing of the instrumentalists.

Pinnacle of Festival

This concert—the first of three which Toscanini will give here during the coming week—marks, with all due respect to various memorable events of the past month, the shining pinnacle of this year's festival, and there is hardly likely to be a Salzburg festival of the near future without its Toscaninian features. Although a splendid attendance at the various events has been the rule this Summer, ever since it became clear that the perils of bombs and disorders were chiefly a trumped-up business for the purposes of alarmist propaganda, the Festival Theater has held, to-date, no audience as large, as brilliant and as representative as was Toscanini's tonight. Fantastic prices were offered at the eleventh hour for unavailable seats.

Prominent in this great and thoroughly international assemblage were Prince Starhemberg, Vice-Chancellor of Austria, and Prince Kinsky, the last-named a descendant of Beethoven's friend and patron.

Transcendent Performances

The program chosen by Toscanini for his Salzburg introduction began, fittingly enough, with that D. major symphony composed by Mozart for Salzburg's wealthy townsman, Sigmund Haffner, and offered in addition the Brahms-Haydn Variations and Beethoven's Seventh symphony. It is carrying coals Newcastleward to tell New York music-lovers at this stage how Toscanini conducts these masterpieces and probably he did them no better in the festival theater this evening than he does them in Carnegie Hall every Winter. And yet to one listener who has heard him give these symphonies and the Brahms Variations innumerable times it seemed unbelievable that Toscanini had ever done them so transcendently.

Alone, the Variations had all the microscopic perfections of Japanese ivory carving. It may be doubted whether Mozart even was more nobly honored in the town of his birth than he was tonight by the performance Toscanini gave of the delicious symphony within a stone's throw of the lomposer's cradle. Beethoven's Seventh roused the audience to a perfect frenzy of intoxication, though as usual the haste with which the conductor took the trio of the scherzo gave the musical jurists on hand something to cudgel their brains about.

The men of the Vienna Philharmonic covered themselves with glory and there was more than the conventional courtesy in Toscanini's gestures indicating that a great share of the evening's triumph belonged to them.

Saar Question Looms As Great Issue In Europe

'Eyelash' Majority Held Possible To Keep It Under Geneva Control

The Saar Basin is Europe's danger spot, with the deadline the January plebiscite, which must determine whether 800,000 people and 16,000,000,000 tons of coal shall revert to Germany, Says Leland Stowe in a Paris cable to the New York Tribune on September 8. When the French government presented its Saar policy in ten typewritten pages to the League of Nations secretariat this week, it fired the opening gun in the first class diplomatic battle which is certain to become one of the dominant international issues for the next eighteen months.

France declared that if the Saarlanders voted to rejoin the Reich, she would nevertheless adhere to her rights under the Versailles Treaty and surrender the Saar mines only after Chancellor Adolf Hitler's bankrupt-pleading government had paid for them in full. When France took over the mines they were estimated to be worth 300,000,000 gold marks—a sum which Hjalmar Schacht, Reichsbank President, might have difficulty in finding today at a moment when he insists that Germany must be granted a complete moratorium of all her foreign debts.

Delicate Problems Involved

The Saar, then, encircles many delicate problems in its 738 square miles, problems delicate for France, Germany and the League alike. Whereas a few years ago every one admitted that a Saar plebiscite should operate overwhelmingly for Germany, Hitlerism has so complicated the Saar loyalties that some people think it is just possible that an eyelash majority might vote to remain under Geneva's jurisdiction.

If this is improbable it is none the less true that nearly 60 per cent of the Saar inhabitants are Catholic, and therefore deeply perturbed about living tomorrow under the National Socialist regime, while thousands of Socialists, Communists, Jews and Pacifists also have sought shelter there. For all these reasons, both national and international, no one can guess just how much trouble may yet come out of the Saar.

Storm Troopers Ready to Act

First of all, at any time from now until the date of the plebiscite, political violence on a serious scale may break out there, and the league administration's present force of 1,000 policemen could scarcely hope to cope therewith. Colonel Geoffrey G. Knox, Chief Commissioner, has himself warned Geneva about these dangers and offered evidence to show that the Nazis have 15,000 camouflaged Storm Troopers ready for action in the Saar.

Whether or not the plebiscite can be conducted without violent episodes or possible foreign intervention remains to be seen. However, beyond these Saar uncertainties largely connected with political antagonisms inside the territory, other equally vital questions loom.

Urgent among them is the one posed by the French memorandum. Supposing the Saar votes for Germany. How then, will is reversion be arranged and when will it be concluded? Germany has now succeeded in having her reparations slate wiped clean. Will she also succeed in recovering the Saar's 16,000,000 tons of coal without paying a very sirable re-purchase price for them, according to Versailles stipulations?

Mine Repurchase an Issue

The French say no, and, as always, submit legal documents to support their argument. Louis Barthou, who is as shrewd and aggressive a Foreign Minister as France has had in many a day, has thrown down the gauntlet to Chancellor Hitler's financial dictator, Hjalmar Schacht, and Schacht knows a great deal about finance and contracts.

If the plebiscite gives its normal verdict, there must be achieved a Franco-German agreement on the repurchase price of the mines. It is to be expected that an agreement only can be reached after much fast foot-and head-work in the chancelleries on both sides of the Rhine. Every step will be contested, every concession reached with difficulty, and at every tough spot the League council and leaders will be obliged to act as arbitrators. A great deal of ink will roll over the world's presses before the Saar's status finally is regulated.

Black Rain Turns Noon To Night In Buenos Aires

BUENOS AIRES, Sept. 5—Black rain fell in Buenos Aires at noon today, giving an unprecedented and weird aspect to the city. The Weather Bureau's analysis showed that the rain water was filled with microscopic particles of burned carbon and unburned petroleum, presumably from the smoke of the recent disaster at Campana, where oil tanks burned for a week following an explosion.

The darkness of night did not lift all afternoon. Buildings were illuminated, electric signs were turned on and street cars ran with lights on.

The heavy rain was accompanied by a cold gale and heavy lightning.

$3,075,103 Tax Asked of Mellon In U. S. Appeal

Former Secretary Insists He's Entitled To Refund; Assails Treasury Stand

Renewing its effort to collect back taxes it claims from Andrew W. Mellon, former Republican secretary of the Treasury, despite its defeat before a Federal Grand Jury, the Bureau of Internal Revenue went before the Board of Tax Appeals on September 15, demanding payment of an alleged delinquency for the taxable year of 1931 of $3,075,103.23 according to the New York Herald Tribune's dispatch from Washington.

This amount, which includes a penalty claim of 50 per cent, compares with the claim of last spring in which the government sought judgment from the Tax Appeals Board for a total of $1,978,621. Additional allegations were presented in the brief, setting forth the demand for the increased assessment which was filed in the form of an answer to Mr. Mellon's reply to Federal contentions of last May. The brief was filed by Robert H. Jackson, assistant general counsel in charge of the Treasury's case.

At the time of the filing of the Mellon answer to the Treasury's original claim for $1,978,621 on the 1931 tax year, the former Secretary denied the Treasury's figures and in turn claimed he was entitled to a refund of $139,045. Mr. Mellon then cited the failure of the government to bring about an indictment against him by a Federal Grand Jury in Pittsburgh for alleged tax evasion on the similar set of facts.

Continuing his fight against the current Administration's claims, Mr. Mellon, through his counsel in Washington, made public a statement characterizing the government's latest action as a procedure adopted "for the sole purpose of distorting the issues in my case in order to save the Treasury's face and give some semblance of jurisdiction for its participation in the inept political maneuver, of Attorney General Cummings last spring."

In announcing the filing of the government's answer, which sets out the grounds upon which the deficiency in income tax is claimed and gives the detail of the charge of fraud, Mr. Jackson explained:

"Mr. Mellon filed his return at Pittsburgh on March 15, 1932, reporting that his gross income and capital gains for the year 1931 had been $10,890,485.40, and his net income $1,927,116.40, and showed, a tax of $647,559.36, which was paid. The government asserts that his actual gross income and capital gain were $15,951,568.15 and was understated to the government by $5,061,082.75.

Stock Losses Challenged

"Mr. Mellon also deducted from his income losses on sales amounting to $7,277,351.30. The government asserts in the answer that $6,525,263.75 of losses on sales of stocks were not in fact sustained, for the reason that the reported sales were fictitious and not in good faith, and computes his net income for 1931 to have been $13,482,660.88 and the additional tax due at $2,050,068.82, with a 50 per cent penalty for fraud amounting to $1,025,034.41, or a total $3,075,103.23.

"In his petition to the Board of Tax Appeals, filed May 25, 1934, Mr. Mellon claims that he overpaid his tax for 1931 by $139,045.17."

The original answer to the Treasury's claim before the Board of Tax Appeals on May 24 was filed by Mr. Mellon after the Department of Justice had announced that Thomas S. Lamont, partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., had paid in full on income tax claims and penalties.

Mr. Lamont was named by Homer S. Cummings, Attorney General, along with Mr. Mellon, Thomas Sidlo, Cleveland lawyer, and James J. Walker, former Mayor of New York, as among several hundred against whom the government was seeking to collect additional taxes. Mr. Sidlo, it has been announced, has paid his assessment.

In the original answer Mr. Mellon disclosed that he paid $647,557 in income taxes for the year of 1931 and listed his charity contributions for that year as ¥3,321,178, a figure now challenged by the government.

Called Move to Save Treasury's Face

In the statement of rebuttal made public here today Mr. Mellon said:

"The Treasury Department, at the direction of Secretary Morgenthau, in its answer to my appeal to the Board of Tax Appeals, takes the astounding position that it intends to try out in a civil tribunal the very same issue of tax evasion settled by the Federal Grand Jury at Pittsburgh last May.

"At that time the grand jury refused to return an indictment against me. Yet the Treasury, in its answer (filed today after nearly four months) continues to question the regularity of my return. It is obvious that these reiterated allegations of tax evasion are made solely for the purpose of distorting the issue in my case in order to save the Treasury's faced to give some semblance of justification for its participation in the inept political maneuver of Attorney General Cummings last spring. At that time, at the Attorney General's instance, the Treasury arbitrarily and capriciously set up additional income taxes as being due from me for the year 1931.

Excuse to Re-try Old Issues

"The Treasury's answer is full of allegations which are contrary to the facts, as it well knows. It repeats the charges thrown out by the Pittsburgh Grand Jury, with the addition of one further charge, both trivial and fictitious in nature, and inserted merely as an excuse to re-try the old issues, and to make the public believe that some new matter is to be considered. It even accuses me of sales of stock to avoid gift taxes, that law not then being in existence, and to avoid estate taxes, ignoring the fact, apparently, that I am still very much alive. The facts set forth in my appeal were sworn to by me, but I note the Treasury did not make its answer under oath. It seems almost unbelievable that a responsible government department should lend itself to such a proceeding.

"This Administration has made a great show of virtue by announcing on every possible occasion that my case is being handled like every one else's. If this is so, and a taxpayer is first to be sent to a grand jury, in ex-parte proceedings, as I was, without a previous hearing or even being advised of the charges, and then, after being exonerated, to have the same charges reiterated by the Treasury and tried out in the civil courts, I can conceive of no more unfair or despotic policy that could be evolved for the collection of revenue."

Jackson Outlines Seven Main Issues

As outlined by Mr. Jackson, the seven main issues in the case, besides the fraud issue, are explained as follows:

"(1) Did A. W. Mellon realize a taxable gain of $6,549,900 in connection with the liquidation of the McClintic-Marshall Corporation? Is said amount taxable at the rate of 20 per cent as dividends or at 12½ per cent as capital gain?

"The stockholders of this corporation were A. W. Mellon, his brother, R. B. Mellon; H. H. McClintic and C. D. Marshall. The corporation transferred its assets to the Union Construction Company and the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, receiving all the stock of Union Construction Company, about 7 per cent of the outstanding common stock of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation and certain bonds of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, or cash. The entire consideration was then distributed to the four stockholders.

"A. W. Mellon's share had a value of $19,749,900, representing a profit to the taxpayer of $8,657,836.47. The government asserts that $6,549,900 of said profit represents taxable gain, and that said amount is subject to the surtax rate of 20 per cent. The taxpayer contends that only $1,830,790.87 of the cash amounting to $2,373,900 received by him in connection with said transaction represents taxable gain, which is subject not to the surtax but to the capital gain rate of 12½ per cent.

Differ on Amount of Taxable Gain

"(2). Did A. W. Mellon realize a taxable gain of $933,847.17 on the liquidation of Union Construction Company? Is said amount taxable at the rate of 20 per cent as a dividend, or at 12½ per cent as capital gain?

Foreign Protests On Arms Pour In

Hull's Conference With Nye Held As Result Of Reverberations Abroad

It was under pressure of diplomatic protests from several foreign countries that Secretary Hull consulted with Senator Nye, chairman of the committee investigating the sale of munitions, on the question of reading into the record testimony involving prominent personages in public life abroad says a Washington dispatch to the New York Times on Sept. 11.

Afterward Senator Nye wrote the following letter to Mr. Hull, who made it public.

"Reports have reached the committee showing a misconception as to the nature of some of the allegations which have been introduced into the record of the special committee investigating the munitions industry as exhibits.

"We have been endeavoring to find the truth in a mass of documents found in the files of munitions manufacturers. The placing of such material in the record from foreign agents of American companies does not necessarily imply the substantiation of the statements found in these agents' documents.

"There has been mention of highly placed personages in foreign countries. The committee deeply regrets that a false impression may have been created, and that statements made by manufacturers' agents abroad, although believed by them, may be unfounded as far as those high personages are concerned, and the committee regrets that the opinions of these agents seem to have been construed as necessarily reflecting the opinion of the committee."

Many Personages Named

The State Department declined to name the countries which have protested about the Nye investigation.

Prominent names mentioned at the Capitol, in the course of the investigation so far, have included King George of Great Britain, Admiral Ismael Galindez, former chief of the Argentine Navy; President Rodriguez of Mexico, Brig. Gen. Juan F. Azcarate, military attache to the Mexican Embassy here; Controller General Lopez of Bolivia, an unnamed Minister of Marine of Turkey, who was alleged to have received a commission on war material sold to his government; an unamed "chef de cabinet" in Brazil, charged with having taken a "commission" of $50,000, and Juan Leguia, son of the former President of Peru.

Argentina is the only country so far to have made an official protest publicly.

Mr. Hull made clear that the State Department did not necessarily attach much credence to testimony involving high places and persons.

"I suppose mendacity reaches its highest point in connection with investigations of the manufacture and sale of munitions," he said.

The Secretary defended the State Department's attitude toward control of the munitions traffic and its promptness in carrying out legislation to that end voted by Congress.

He promised that his department would furnish the fullest possible cooperation to the Nye committee, and said that, although the question had not yet risen, he was confident this government would be willing to turn over information in its possession to any other government desiring to conduct a similar investigation.

Tells of Fight on Arms

Mr. Hull said he and his associates had urged on the Senate ratification of the 1925 munitions convention, which was finally accomplished on June 15; they had advocated the Chaco arms embargo, finally passed by the Senate on May 24; they had suggested the Cuban arms embargo proclaimed June 29.

In connection with the Chaco arms embargo against Bolivia ond Paraguay, the State Department authorized a statement in which it was said:

"Immediately upon the signature of the President's proclamation and for some weeks thereafter, interested companies wrote to the Secretary of State and their representatives called at the department, requesting an interpretation of the joint resolution of Congress. The department uniformly refused to exceed its authority by attempting to interpret the joint resolution.

"The interpretation of this joint resolution, like that of any other statute, is a function, in the first instance, of the Department of Justice, which is charged with the prosecution of offenders, and, in the last analysis, of the courts of the United States before which cases arising under it would be tried.

The companies which wrote to the Secretary of State and the representatives who called at the department were so informed."

high official circles. I repeat this is a highly official report rendered by the War Air Corps to the War Ministry in Washington."

In another letter written to Frank Sweetzer secretary of the American Armament Corporation, under date of May 27, 1933, from Rio de Janeiro, Mr. Miranda said that "Jackson, the commercial attache, and Major Sackville, the military attache of the embassy (American) have been 100 per cent helpful."

In this letter he referred to expenses in Rio, saying among other things that one had to take into consideration "this officer for lunch, that one for dinner and Sackville for cocktails, &c."

Japanese Order Planes

An indication that the Japenese Navy was turning to the United States for the latest in aviation equipment was given in a letter from Okura & Co. to the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, Burbank, Calif. The letter, found in Mr. Miranda's files, was dated June 13, 1934, and read:

"We have had the great pleasure of having secured an order for the Japanese Navy for one (1) complete set of your Electra Model 10A and the order has been placed through Mr. A. J. Miranda Jr., who is your representative in this city for the Far East.

"We trust that this matter is now having your kind attention and hope that this order will be executed to entire satisfaction to our naval clients in Japan.

"In the meanwhile we were advised by our head office in Tokyo to the effect that the following naval officers are coming to the State very shortly and that they have recommended them to visit your plant on their way to the East. There officers, accompanied by our Mr. T. Imai, who is also arriving per S. S. Chichibu Maru, which is due at Los Angeles on June 29, are: Captain M. Hirose, Engineer Mr. K. Saneyoshi, Commander J. Okamura, Lieut. Commander Y. Yamada.

"We shall, therefore, be very much obliged if you will be good enough to receive these officers and do your utmost in demonstrating in every way possible your products, inasmuch as these officers are very important to us for the sake of future business."

Negotiation During Armistice

According to the evidence, the American armament corporation continued to negotiate with Colombia during an armistice between that country and Peru. One of the agents of the corporation, referring to the Peruvian-Colombian situation, said that "a big time is expected by all," adding:

"We have chosen Colombia because they have money and Peru has very little."

The negotiations during the armistice were "absolutely confidential," said Mr. Miranda.

When asked by Senator Nye if his dealings in South America involved what Soley & Co. called "grease" in one letter and "palm oil" in another, Mr. Miranda laughed and nodded his head. Soley and Co. had written that "'enough grease and palm oil will work wonders down there."

There was laughter in the hearing room when a letter was produced in which the Soley company suggested that they might consider, if necessary, the taking of cocoanuts, lumber, rubber or concessions as part payment for orders from countries whose finances were in not too good shape. Another suggestion was "guano from Peru and emeralds from Colombia."

Specific charges of graft disclosed today included "fifty grand," which, it was said, would have to be set aside for the "chef de cabinet" of Brazil, and an extra 15 per cent to be added to a Cuban contract for certain "interested parties."

Officers of the Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation were called near the end of the afternoon session. J. G. Allard, president, headed the group. In the short time they were on the stand the committee brought out facts about the tie-up between the Curtiss-Wright company, General Motors, the duPonts, Douglas Aircraft and other corporations interested in the aviation industry.

Butterflies Have Feathers

The wings and body of every species of the butterfly family are covered with minute feathers so small that they cannot be seen with the naked eye. When in touch with a human hand or any other object, these feathers are shed in sufficient quantities to resemble a brownish powder. Placed under a microscope the dust is revealed to consist of feathers perfect in every detail including quill, ribs and shape of a bird's feather. These feathers are essential for the butterfly's flight. When removed in sufficient quantities the insect is unable to remain in the air.

An international marriage of much interest in Tokyo was the ceremony on Monday, which united Mr. Robert Yoshinori Horiguchi, son of Mr. Kumaichi Horiguchi, former Japanese Minister to Brazil and Rumania, and Mrs. Horiguchi of 108 Kobinata, Suidocho, Koishikawa, and Miss Karin Broemmelsiek, eldest daughter of Mr. E. W. Broemmelsiek, president of the Drug Package Inc. and Mrs. Broemmelsiek of 28 Clermont Lane, Clayton, Mo.

The ceremony was performed in the rectory of the Koishikawa Catholic Church by the Rev Father Joseph Flaujac, vicar-general.

The groom was graduated from the Gyosei Middle School, Tokyo, attended Keio University, and received the degree of Bachelor of Journalism from the University of Missouri in 1931. He received his Master of Arts degree from the same university in 1932.

After serving on the staff of The Japan Times, Mr. Horiguchi became a member of the staff of the International News Service, Chicago Bureau, and later joined The Japan Advertiser.

He was then attached to the Japanese Delegation to the Extraordinary Assembly of the League of Nations convened to discuss the Sino-Japanese dispute, serving as private secretary to Mr. Yosuke Matsuoka. Mr. Horiguchi since his return has served as member of the Shanghai staff of Shimbun Rengo, and editor of the English service of Shimbun Rengo.

The bride graduated from Beaumont High School, St. Louis, and attended the University of Missouri at Columbia, Mo, where she was enrolled in the school of journalism.

Mr. and Mrs. Horiguchi will leave Tokyo soon to make their home in Shanghai.

British Back Loan To House Arabs

2,000,000 Pounds Voted To Promote Public Works In Palestine

A £2,000,000 loan guaranteed by the British Government has been authorized by Parliament to provide for the resettlement of Arabs and the completion of important public work schemes in Palestine, according to a London dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

The loan is to be issued shortly by the Government of Palestine One-eighth of the money is to be spent on resettling Arabs displaced from the lands they occupied in consequence of the land passing into Jewish hands as a result of Jewish immigration into Palestine in recent years.

This is in accordance with a pledge given by the British Government as the mandatory power after the 1930 riots in May 1930 Sir John Hope Simpson C. I. E. who in 1925 helped the League of Nations and the Greek Government to settle more than 2,000,000 Greek refugees in western Thrace, visited Palestine at the request of the British Government and returned with expert recommendations on immigration, land settlement and development which it is now hoped to carry out.

In his report Sir John pointed out that 29.4 per cent of the 86,980 rural Arab families in the villages were landless.

While the condition of the Arab fellah "is little if at all superior to what it was under the Turkish regime . . . the Jewish settlers have had every advantage that capital, science and organization could give them," the report states, whereas the Arab "has had none of these advantages and has received practically no help to improve his cultivation or his standard of life."

Sir John estimated the cost of settling one Arab family at about £60 The Arab builds his own house which costs him £10 a room. If he builds a two-roomed house £40 will remain to buy "a good cow an iron plough and a harrow."

At this rate, some 4166 Arab families might be settled with the £250,000 allocation proposed by the Government, compared with the 28,000 families Sir John estimated to be without land.

Of the remainder of the loan, £933,000 will be used for drainage schemes and £200,000 for agricultural credits and long-term loans to Arab and Jewish cultivators in the plains and hill districts.

A sum of £210,000 has been earmarked for the construction of an oil-berth and the land-reclamation scheme at Haifa, which will facilitate the export of oil from the Iraq Petroleum Company's pipeline terminus at that port.

Lastly, more than £400,000 will be spent on the construction of public buildings, including a new post office and telephone exchange at Jerusalem, and new schools for Arab children.

One of the provisions of the loan is that plant and machinery and material imported into Palestine in execution of the proposed public works shall, as far as possible, be of United Kingdom origin.

Off-Pitch Tones Of Singers Sound True

NEW YORK, Sept. 6.—An artist never sings in true pitch. The voice pictures of famous singers proving this were exhibited yesterday at the opening session of the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association.

The singers whose voices were caught by the camera in wavy sound tracks included Tibbett, Crooks Homer, Ponselle, Kraft, Baker and Marsh. The off-pitch tricks were shown in a study different from ordinary scientific voice analysis in that it sought the source of the artistic and beautiful instead of merely sound analysis.

"If the artist did sing in true pitch," said Dr. Harold G. Seashore of the State University of Iowa, "his singing would not be musically acceptable."

The listener, he explained, not only tolerates such "off-pitchness," but insists that the tones are on pitch. The answer is that singing art comprises not only the artist's own vocal abilities, but the auditory illusions he is able to impress on his audience.

The voice pictures show the singing tones as a rapid up and down oscillation, called technically the vibration. When singing the note F, for example, the great singers' voices sometimes are nearly a half note above, toward G, or as far below true F, dropping down toward D.

Due to the fast up and down oscillations, some part of each sound wave usually touches F—or whatever pitch is sought—but the average sound is above or below the true note 75 to 80 per cent of the time.

This wide margin seems to account for richness of tone. Dr. Seashore said that voices singing on "true pitch" sound thin.

An Artistic Deviation

"The pitch designated by the musical score," he said, "is primarily a reference level about which the artist deviates in an artistic manner."

Mr. Lawrence Tibbett's range is about eight-tenths of a full note. That is, his pitch will range from four-tenths above to four below the note the score calls for. Mr. Richard Crooks's range is seven-tenths.

Dr. Seashore said that if a singer is below true pitch on one interval he or she tends to rise above it on the next interval, in order to compensate.

A discovery which tends to explain why this variation takes place was reported by Dr. S. S. Stevens of Harvard University.

"Contrary to what is generally supposed," he said, "the pitch of a tone does not depend solely upon the frequency, but varies when the energy is changed. An increase in energy lowers the pich of low tones, but raises the pitch of high tones.

New Drug Found Aid In Pneumonia

Pittsburgh Chemists Tell Of Success With Derivative Of Quinine

A new drug, which has so far proved successful in the treatment of all types of pneumonia in animals and has produced results described as "very encouraging" in a limited number of human cases where other known means had failed, was reported here today before the meeting of the American Chemical Society by scientists from the Mellon Institute for Industrial Research, Pittsburgh, according to a Cleveland dispatch to the New York Times on September 11. The account follows:

The new anti-pneumonia drug is a synthetic product made in the institute's department of research in pure chemistry. It is a derivative from quinine. Unlike a serum, it can be given by mouth in the form of tablets. In the experiments so far it has proved effective against all the known types of pneumonia germs.

The report emphasized, however, that it is as yet too early to state that "a suitable drug for the treatment of pneumonia has been found"

"The Work," the report stated, "is still in the experimental stage. The final decision as to the efficiency of any of these preparations will depend on the results of very large numbers of experiments."

In all, four different preparations, all quinine derivatives, have been used so far in the animal experiments, out of many studied. One of these was tried clincally in some human cases on patients whose physicians had given up hope. The few cases tried so far, not enough on which to base any conclusions, it was emphasized, have recovered without any untoward after effects.

Atoms Are Shuffled

This drug was administered to mice which had been inoculated with pneumonia germs in doses 1,000 times greater than the amount sufficient to cause death. Of thirty such mice twenty-nine recovered, the report stated.

The research is being carried on by Drs. C. L. Butler, Alice G. Renfrew and Leonard H. Cretcher of the regular research staff in pure chemistry of the Mellon Institute, under grants of Andrew W. Mellon and other members of the Mellon family.

The work was carried on in collaboration with H. H. Permar, John M. Johnston and Joseph R. Kenny of the Mercy Hospital in Pittsburgh.

The results so far represent another example of the marvels of modern alchemy. It may be described as a highly complicated game of "shuffling atoms." Taking a deck of "atoms" supplied by nature, in which the atoms are arranged in a way unsuitable for human purposes, the chemist keeps "shuffling and reshuffling" them, until he gets just the "hand" he can play to win with.

In this case the "deck of atoms" consisted of a quinine derivative known as "optochin." It has been known to medicine for many years as highly destructive to pneumonia germs of all types. But it is, unfortunately, unsuitable for human use, as it is dangerous not only to the germs but also to the patient.

"The effective curing dose and the fatal (lethal) dose were too close together to allow a sufficient margin of safety."

Results Inspire Hope

The problem the Mellon Institute chemists set for themselves three years ago, when they began their experiments, was to make optochin harmless to animals and human beings while at the same time retaining its deadliness for pneumonia germs. The preliminary results obtained so far hold out high hopes that they have succeeded in accomplishing their objective.

The work involved the "re-shuffling" of the atoms" in the complicated chemical structure of the optochin molecule, which consists of nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen and oxygen, arranged in chemical "rings."

One of the groups in the molecule consists of three hydrogen atoms. Reducing this group to two and then introducing another group of one atom of hydrogen and one of oxygen, has changed optochin from a drug which produced blindness and death to another drug which holds out promise of relieving humanity from one of its deadliest scourages.

In technical language, the "reshuffling" is described as the "introduction into the ethyl ether grouping of an alcoholic hydroxyl group." The chemical formula for the hydroxyl group is OH, one atom of oxygen and one of hydrogen bound together. It is part of the chemical formula for alcohol, which is C_2H_5OH.

The drug that has so far been tried on human cases is an apoquinine derivative, which also has been "de-poisonized" by the introduction of the hydroxyl group. Its chemical name is "beta-hydroxyethy-apoquinine."

Second Drug Is Tried Out

"This substance," the report stated, "showed a very high pneumonia-germ-killing (pneumococcicidal) power in the test tube (in vitro), greatly lowered toxicity in mice, and very high protective power.

"Further, highly purified apoquinine itself, the parent substance of the apo-derivatives, has also proved to be of low toxicity and high protective power."

Another "reshuffling" of the optochin molecule, with the aid of the hydroxyl group, resulted in a new drug bearing the chemical tag of "beta-hydroxy-ethel-hydrocupreine."

"This drug," the report stated, "had in vitro (in the test tube) only one-fourth of the pneumococcicidal (pneumonia germ-killing) value of optochin. It was, however, much less toxic to mice and was very efficient in protecting these animals from pneumoncoccic infection.

"It is well known that substances containing an alcoholic hydroxyl group are often less toxic than the corresponding hydrocarbon residue. Because of the demonstrated value of optochin, it seemed desirable to attempt the de-toxification of this substance by introduction of the hydroxyl group into the ethyl ether grouping.

"It is generally accepted among physicians that the therapeutics of pneumonia is far from satisfactory. Serum therapy has been successful to a certain extent for one type of pneumonia, but for other types it has little or no proved value.

Sought a New Approach

"Serum therapy demands accurate laboratory work and therefore will not be available except in the larger centers for a long time. Consequently, a new approach is desirable. Many physicians who have the basis of attack on the disease should be directly on the pneumoncoccus.

"Accordingly, for the past three years we have been engaged on the study of the chemical treatment of this disease. The work to date had been wholly concerned with the preparation and study of quinine derivatives.

"Biological and chemical experiments on these new substances, some of which have so far been obtained only in small amounts, are in progress. The biological work has largely progressed past the animal experimentation stage. While some preliminary clinical results are very encouraging, it should be emphasized that the final decision will depend on the results of very large numbers of experiments."

The work, the report added, has now progressed to a state where the cooperation of the medical profession is necessary. As in the case of insulin, the new drugs will first have to be tried on thousands and tens of thousands of pneumonia cases regarded as hopeless, in the various hospitals throughout the country.

When the large scale tests have lived up to the expectations justified by the limited number of human cases tried so far, it is pointed out, the new quinine drugs will then be safely standardized and made available for application in general medical use.

At such time should it come, the drug, due to the fact that it can be administered by mouth, will prove a boon to pneumonia sufferers even in the most isolated sections of the world, since it will eliminate the elaborate and expensive technique now required in the treatment.

Furthermore, should the drugs prove harmless, as they have proved so far, it will eliminate the necessity of laboratory tests for the presence of pneumonia, as physicians could administer then even on suspicion that pneumonia exists.

Many Compounds in Substance

How propiophenone, a substance prepared easily in the laboratory from benzol and propionic acid, can, by slight changes in its chemical formula, be converted into thirteen different compounds, having seven different effects upon the human system, was described before the meeting by Dr. Walter H. Hartung, of Sharp and Dohme, Inc., Philadelphia.

Because of its pleasant odor, propiophenone is used as a perfume. By chemical manipulation this perfume can be converted into different local anesthetics, a flavor suggesting licorice, a germicide eight times stronger than carbolic acid, a tear-producer, a synthetic ephedrine, and five other compounds similar in action to ephedrine.

"While there is abundant evidence," Dr. Hartung stated, "of an actual relationship between physiological action and chemical constitution, our knowledge thereof is as yet so elemental that we cannot even yet vault the comparatively low hurdle raised by the chemical family descended from propiophenone."

The results of studies of cancer in mice were presented by Dr. Emil Bogen and Dr. Russell N. Loomis, of Olive View, Calif.

"Cancer of the skin in mice," they reported, "cannot be produced by any type of prolonged irritation, but is specifically and uniformly induced by certain kinds of complex unsaturated organic compounds."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Speedy Justice

Courts and officers of the law in other states of the union could take a good lesson from the quick justice meted out in Oregon in June of this year when one Stanley Rayson, a bold bank robber, was serving a 20-year sentence in the Oregon Penitentiary less than 5 hours after he had committed the crime.

Rayson walked into the E. G. Young bank at Oakland, Oregon, held up cashier Garrison and then walked out with $1,881 in currency. Hurriedly pursued by the State Police and a posse, Rayson was cornered on the highway a few miles away and was brought to Roseburg, where an immediate trial was held before Circuit Judge B. L. Eddy. Rayson pleaded guilty, the judge pronounced sentence of 20 years, and the robber was immediately placed in the penitentiary—4½ hours after the one-man hold-up was committed.

Speer Slaying Baffles Police As Clues Scarce

bitter factional fight within the religious organization backing the school, which was founded by the Evangelists Moody and Sankey, and in which the forces supporting Mr. Speer were victorious two years ago.

Previous to Mr. Speer's regime the boys were required to abide by strict rules. He permitted them to compete against other schools in sports and to have social contacts with the girls at Northfield Seminary.

In general, he changed the atmosphere to that of a preparatory school rather than a "monastery."

His attitude was said to have angered conservative followers of the founders.

Thomas Speech Caused Row

The felling reached its peak last June when Norman Thomas, Socialist leader, addressed the school at the invitation of Mr. Speer.

Investigators assert there is a possibility that one of Dr. Speer's opponents, maddened over the prospect of the opening of another term Monday under what he regarded as an unfit leader, might have goaded himself into the shooting.

Of one thing District Attorney Bartlett said he was convinced—that in the pitch dark of last night and in the heavily wooded school grounds, with their paths forming a veritable labyrinth, many leading to blind ends, the murdered must have been a "person very familiar with the terrain of the school."

"In the utter blackness which prevails on the campus at night no stranger could have found his way to the house in its remote location and then escaped," the official declared.

Police checked the activities of a number of instructors discharged from the school. One such man, living within the confines of Greater Boston, was awakened for questioning early this morning, but he proved his innocence.

Another discharged instructor living twenty miles from Boston was being sought for interrogation.

Woods Searched for Gun

The house was closely guarded by police today, and officers combed the woods near by in a search for the gun.

This hunt was extended to many farm homes, where shotguns used by rural residents in the hunting season was found, but there was nothing to connect any of these with the shooting.

The headmaster was shot to death as he sat in his study. Several of the bullets from the gun entered Mr. Speer's chest and State police dug several others from a wall in the rear.

Two jagged holes in the curtainless closed window remain as evidence of the shooting.

Only the wife of the 35-year-old headmaster and her parents, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. Welles of Montclair, N. J., who were visiting her, heard the shot. They knew of no motive for the shooting.

Funeral services will be held at the Speer home tomorrow afternoon, conducted by the Rev. Chester White, pastor of the Mount Hermon School Church.

Burial will be in Englewood, N. J.

Gave Stranger a Lift

NORTHFIELD, Mass., Sept. 15.—State police were notified today that a man giving the name of Sydney Gold of Brookline had telephoned the Boston police this afternoon that he could tell them who killed Mr. Speer.

Later tonight the investigators here were informed that questioning of Mr. Gould at his home had brought out a statement that on Thursday night he gave a short ride in his car to a man who told him that he was on his way to Mount Hermon School.

His description of this man was forwarded here.

Students Clash With Police In Havana Protest

Day Of Wild Shooting Ended Bloodlessly With Truce; Radio Seized

After a day of wild shooting, in which not a single bullet took effect, a truce was called tonight between left-wing Havana University students and the police according to a vivid story describing the riot cabled from Havana on September 1 to the New York Herald Tribune by Mr. Jack O'Brinex. The youths were protesting, on the university grounds, against the killing earlier today of Rodolfo Sanchez twenty-two years old, and Ivo Fernandez, twenty-one, former students.

The two youths were shot to death while being transferred to Principe Prison from the downtown police station, where they were held as terrorists Radical students charged that soldiers and police "assassinated" the pair. Reinald Balmaseda, nineteen, who was wounded critically at the same time as the other two, told newspaper men at the hospital: "we were shot by soldiers while en route to jail. They turned machine guns on us and then fired wildly in the air as if they were attempting to repel an attack."

Earlier the police had stated that the prisoners were shot when an unknown group attempted to rescue Sanchez, who twice before had been snatched away from the police.

Employees of the Labor Department called a seventy-two-hour strike, starting Monday, in protest against the killing of Sanchez and Fernandez, and Treasury Department employees voted to support the move. Students of the university voted a twenty-four-hour strike, also starting Monday. Sanchez was a Labor Department employee.

Traffic was paralyzed around the University grounds while the fracas was going on this afternoon. On two occasions the police released tear gas when disorderly groups of alleged Communists started small riots near midtown Havana, throwing hundreds of shoppers and American tourists into panic.

One group of heavily armed youths seized the radio station CMQ and, while they held the announcer and two other employees at the point of guns, broadcast a fiery address denouncing the army and the Mendieta government for permitting "the same tactics as were used by Machado the tyrant." They concluded by calling on the workers to "establish a soviet government in Cuba."

With the bullets still whistling past the heads of the cordon of police around the University, Dr. Luis Ortega, the rector, with other members of the university faculty, hurried to confer with President Carlos Mendita and shortly afterward a truce was announced, the police moving back two or three blocks from the university grounds.

Another "bloody Sunday" is feared tomorrow when the radical students, with other extremists, march from the university to Colon Cemetery with the bodies of the slain youths.

The soldier who died of wounds received yesterday, when he attempted to resist a group of armed youths who kidnapped Sanchez from the criminal court, was buried with full military honors this morning.

Stronger Law For Safety At Sea Demanded

Morro Castle Disaster Will Result In Revamping Of Marine Laws

Complete revamping of laws and rules relating to rescues and salvage at sea are certain to follow the federal inquiries into the destruction of the steamship Morro Castle of the Ward Line, in the opinions of competent observers in the international shipping world.

Aside from this, interest in New York is centering on what the investigations may reveal regarding the cause of the fire on board the Morro Castle. The concensus was that reports originating in Havana that the fire was due to incendiarism have not been justified. Instead, the view was widely held that it was due rather to carelessness by drunken revelers during the "celebration" on the last nights at sea, says the New York Times.

Strength was given to this opinion by a statement by a member of the Morro Castle's crew that he had warned passengers against throwing lighted cigarettes and matches on the floor of the room where the fire was first seen, and that the carpet on this floor, having recently been cleaned by the use of an inflammable chemical, burned like tinder, causing the fire to spread so rapidly that it was impossible to control it, and, in a short while, the entire port side of the vessel was aflame.

Closer Contact

That this kind of carelessness and thoughtlessness of the safety of other passengers can be overcome only by closer contact of the captains of vessels and their passengers and by more rigid supervision of passengers' conduct was the view expressed in marine circles. It was held by some observers that such supervision was almost as necessary to the safety of vessels as was the direction of the navigation, since without such direct control, a vessel is always liable to just such a fire as destroyed the Morro Castle. Some proponents of this theory declared it was well within the right of the master of a vessel to deny liquor to a passenger who was threatened with intoxication.

At the same time, the absolute need of the closest kind of a watch being kept on all parts of a vessel, and especially during "celebrations," with a view to fire preventon, was stressed.

The hazard of fires would be greatly minimized through the employment of less inflammable materials and wood in interior construction of vessels, as recommended by President Roosevelt. Indeed, the President's recommendations were seen as offering ship owners constructive proposals, and it was not doubted that they will receive serious consideration.

Along with the demand for closer supervision by the captain over conduct of passengers, it was again reiterated that captains of vessels must, to more properly safeguard human life, be relieved of the pressure by ship owners against calling for aid because of the high cost of salvage, which, in many instances, amounts to 50 per cent of the value of the ship and cargo.

Strange Charges

Testimony by Acting Capt. William F. Warms was interpreted as indicating that his fear of salvage charges was a chief factor in causing him to hold back his first S O S call. At the same time, it was recalled that the saving of passengers entailed no charge; that it was the duty of any vessel to respond promptly to calls for help and to take passengers off a foundering ship, even though it could accept no financial return for the service.

Meanwhile, the recommendation of a prominent marine engineer that all salvage charges be abolished, published in an exclusive interview in The Christian Science Monitor on Wednesday, was stimulating discussion as to ways and means of increasing the safety of passengers at sea.

Until the federal investigations have reported on the Morro Castle disaster, the tendency here is against criticism of the conduct of the officers and crew of the vessel, since, it is held, such criticism might serve to prejudice their case, which is most serious and is intensified by the fact that 29 per cent of the passengers were lost and only 18 per cent of the crew. Furthermore, some of the lifeboats reached shore without any passengers and with a relatively small number of the crew who had, obviously, put off precipitately from the stricken vessel intent only on saving themselves.

Stuck to the Last

If this is proved, it was declared, it should not be interpreted as meaning that the sea is now without its heroes. Acting Captain Warms and some of his officers stuck to the ship to the last, to be taken off alive only when the Coast Guard practically forced them to come on board their cutter.

Indeed, it was declared, the sea today has as many heroes as it ever had and the action of a few of the crew of the Morro Castle at a time when Chief Officer Warms was forced, through no action of his own into command of the vesssel at a moment of greatest stress and peril, should not be interpreted in a way that would indict the whole army of gallant men who go down to the sea in ships.

The Morro Castle, first vessel built under the Jones-White Act, which was passed in President Coolidge's Administration to create an American merchant marine, has—ever since it slid down the ways on the day of its christening—been considered about as fireproof and as safe as any vessel afloat.

Eager to make the first ship built under the Merchant Marine law a model of what an American merchant ship should be, its builders exceeded strength and safety specifications in an effort to produce a vessel that would set a standard for other construction engineers to aim at.

The Federal Government has a larger financial interest in the Morro Castle than even the Ward Line, owners of the vessel. Under the terms of the Merchant Marine Act, the Shipping Board was authorized to lend an amount equal to 75 per cent of the cost of new vessels as an encouragement to building up an American merchant marine.

The Morro Castle and her sister ship, the Oriente, were built in 1930 as units of this fleet.

Italy's Plans

The heads of the Italian National Federations of Industry met in Milan recently, for the purpose of considering the methods to be adopted in the coming months to combat unemployment. The Times correspondent states that it was decided (1) to extend to all industries the shift system in such a way as to secure that the maximum number of workers shall be afforded the chance of employment; (2) to shorten the working time-table in all industrial undertakings; (3) to abolish overtime; (4) to order piecework so that the duration of work be in relation to its yield; (5) to control, especially in the textile industries, the work done by machinery; (6) to control the use of machinery. The reorganization of the labor exchanges was also recommended in order to secure greater efficiency from them.—Engineering.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Aged Hiker

Many years ago Ed Hartley of Berkeley, California, started hiking from Berkeley to Redwood Peak and return, and in 1907 set up a record of 7 hours for the trip, covering 24 miles of difficult trail. Each year since then he has bettered his own record, until last year, at the age of 76, he made the jaunt in 5 hours and 35 minutes. The hike was made under the auspices of the Acme Athletic Club, whose members have been enthusiastic reporters of Old Man Hartley every year.

The Trick Falls

To the uninitiated, the Trick Falls of Glacier Park are indeed tricky, because half of the year the falls don't even go over the falls. Underneath the rock precipice is a subterranean outlet for the waters of the river above, and during the dry season this underground passage accommodates the entire flow of the river and no water goes over the falls. However, during the season of rains and snow the cascade is a marvellous spectacle, when the falls become so tremendous that the underground river is entirely hidden.

Graf Zeppelin A Visitor At French Army Games

BESANCON, France, Sept. 11—While French troops executed maneuvers today to thwart an imaginary invasion from Germany, the Graf Zeppelin suddenly appeared out of the mists.

The air liner, en route to South America, flew at an altitude of less than 1,000 feet, its passengers looking down on the war games. The French soldiers craned their necks as the Graf Zeppelin flew over them. Then it disappeared in the distance.

Military leaders watched critically as two divisions of troops went through the maneuvers. The defense problems were worked out under the eyes of General Maurice Gustave Gamelin, chief of staff, who is expected to succeed General Maxime Weygand as head of the army when the later retires next January.

Soviet Navy Has 65 Ships, League Year Book Shows

Tonnage Estimate Is 194,615; Nation Now Building Six Submarines

The Soviet Union, which has been consistently shy in revealing its military or naval status to the outside world, plays a minor role in naval affairs as shown in the League of Nations armament yearbook.

While the Red Army is popularly credited with being one of the largest in the world, the Soviet Government has made no effort to put a fleet on the ocean comparable even with some of its small neighbors, and now boasts sixty-five warships of 194,615 tons, most of them dating from before the World War, Says the New York Times.

Japan, which always figures in any talk of war between the Soviet to 889,010 tons.

Union and other nations, has 216 modern warships of 820,337 tons and is building twenty-one new ships which will increase its total tonnage

The League Secretariat explains in a foot-note in the volume that official and public documents do not give desired information on Soviet naval affairs and that the data presented have been gathered from various technical sources.

The Red Navy is pictured as composed of four battleships of 93,480 tons, seven cruisers of 49,980 tons, thirty-eight destroyers of 41,776 tons, and sixteen submarines of 9,679 tons. Six submarines, now under constructon, will give the Soviet Union a navy of seventy-one vessels of 197,465 tons.

The four battleships—Pariskaia, Kommuna, Marat, Oktiabraskaia, Revolutia and Mikhail Furunze—are each of 23,370 tons and were launched in 1914-15. Three of the cruisers date from shortly after the Russo-Japanese War and one dates from the World War. Two were launched in 1924-25; one was launched in 1930 and one in 1932.

With one exception the destroyers were launched from 1900 on to the World War. The submarines all date from the World War.

The League of Nations data put the Soviet Union's army at 5,200,000 men and 37,700 officers, of whom 23,039 men and 2,397 officers are classified as naval forces.

The Soviet Union's low naval ranking in relation to other world powers, is shown by comparable naval statistics from the League's data.

France has 185 warships of 541,630 tons, with thirty-five ships under construction, which will bring the total to 220 ships of 658,091 tons.

Germany has forty-seven warships of 152,480 tons, with two ships under construction, which will bring the total to forty-nine ships of 172,480 tons.

Italy has 177 warships of 378,858 tons, with thirty-eight ships under construction, which will give her 215 ships of 445,979 tons.

Great Britain has 254 warships of 1,095,400 tons and thirty-one ships now being built will increase the total to 285 ships of 1,172,130 tons.

The United States has 350 warships of 1,007,400 tons and fifty-one ships under construction to raise the total to 401 ships of 1,228,350 tons.

Italian Embassy At Peiping Cause Of Speculation

Public Fears Change May Be Preliminary To Removal Of Legations

The raising of the Italian Legation to the status of an Embassy caused a certain amount of excitement both in diplomatic circles and amongst Peking public generally. The reasons for the excitement were, however somewhat different in the two cases. In diplomatic circles there was merely a feeling of pained surprise, because it was considered a breach of the agreement by which the various governments had bound themselves not to take this step separately, says the North China Daily News. As one member of the Diplomatic Corps said: "It is an old story, this separate action by one Power—and not in China only."

The Peking public was moved by quite other considerations. The technical and diplomatic side of the question left them cold, but what did cause a certain amount of excitement, was the fear that this change might be a preliminary to the early removal of the Legations. Indeed, for a short time, definite rumors were going about that the Italian Government had offered the Legation site to the Papel Nuncio. This was denied both by the Legation and the Catholic organizations concerned. But the Peking dovecotes were quite considerably fluttered.

Not a Pressing Matter

From inquiries here at various Legations it is gathered that the removal of the Legations south is not, at the moment, a burning question and is not being seriously considered as a matter of practical politics. A slight indication of this is the fact that the American Guard have just built a large Recreation Hall on their drill-ground, out of canteen funds, which they would scarcely have done, if an early departure of the Guard were intended.

For the diplomats there still remains the difficult question: "Where then are we to move to?" If there were any clear and reasonable indications as to where the capital of China was likely to be permanently established, at any rate for the next fifty years or so, the Legations would move tomorrow. Such, however, is not the case, and everybody has his own pet theory on this subject. The site of the future capital of China is veiled in doubt and mystery. To misquote Hamlet:—Ay, there's the rub ....That makes them hug the place they love, than fly to others that they know not of. As a matter of fact, it is a financial rather than a political question. For in these gloomy days of economic depression it would be a bold minister who would lightheartedly take the risk of recommending to a penurious government the very considerable expenditure entailed by the erection of a new Legation at Nanking. Only to find, a little later, that he had failed to spot the right capital after all.

Nanchang the Capital?

In this connection it is interesting to learn that, contrary to the general belief, the Chinese government has not been pressing this question of the removal of the Legations on the Foreign Powers. One cannot help wondering whether its reluctance to do so, springs from their own feeling of uncertainty about the final site of the capital of China, or whether from their fear that, if the Legations were moved from Peking, it would give the Japanese a freer hand in the disposal of North China. Certainly, in Chinese circles, one hears much less talk about Nanking these days and a lot about Nanchang which seems to be gaining rapidly in importance.

The Ministry of Communications is erecting a large modern building there, and numerous other government offices are being put up. The greater part of the Ministry of War—of which, as most people seem to forget, General Ho Ping-chin here in Peking is the head—and the General Staff are now permanently stationed in Nanchang, as also Bureau for the Suppression of Opium, a very considerable revenue—bringing concern. The largest aerodrome in China is now in course of erection, not to mention the fact that the better part of the Chinese army is collected there. And finally, people whisper mysteriously into your ear: Wait and see, what will be the outcome of the Party Congress in November. So, here looming on the horizon, appears another of those puzzling "alternative capitals."

A further Lease of Life

One point in favor of Nanchang as against Nanking—and a not unimportant one for Chinese governments these days—would be that it is situated away from the Yangtze, and so not directly accessible to threats from foreign warships. Otherwise, those concerned, that is to say those who will have less desirable place of residence than Nanking especially as regards the climate. This, however, leaves out of account the delightful hill resort of Kuling which is close by, and to which tired diplomats could retire from the summer heat and recoup from their arduous labors.

Anyhow, whether it is to be Nanking, Nanchang or even far-off Sianfu, for the moment it looks as if poor old Peking was to be granted a further short lease of life which, after all, is very much more important.

The Eternal Perambulator Pusher

Pioneer residents of Two Rivers, Wisconsin, cannot remember the time when Mrs. Aimee Miller has not been seen on the streets and highways pushing an empty baby carriage. Curious folk have questioned her at times regarding this strange habit, and she only states that the buggy serves as a cane, and she is unable to walk unaided. But strangely enough she has many times walked from Two Rivers over to Algoma and back, about 75 miles, refusing lifts from motorists as she pushed her trusty "cane on wheels."

Mrs. Miller is now about 79 years old and has been faithfully pushing the carriage about for more than 32 years.

Soviet Gold Output Up 49.4% This Year

MOSCOW, Sept. 11—Joseph Stalin's statement last Christmas that Soviet gold production would be tripled or quadrupled within the next few years is supported by an announcement today that production during the first eight months of this year had increased 49.4 percent over that of the corresponding period last year.

The August production was .3 percent over the quota and showed an increase of 40 percent as compared with the figures for August, 1933.

M. Stalin, at Christmas time, also broke the official silence regarding the amount of Soviet gold production, saying it had been approximately 100,000,000 gold rubles last year. That would make the estimated figure for this year about 150,000,000.

Production in September, which is always the peak month, is expected to amount to 20,000,000 gold rubles. There is usually a seasonal drop in the last quarter.

Mining of the Soviet gold supply, which is chiefly alluvial, is usually hampered by frost, although recent developments in mechanization and in the utilization of electric power have greatly increased the Winter production, as compared with the output in the years before the Five-Year Plan.

Mr. Tighe is also well known for his plays which have been produced on the London stage, among them being "Open Spaces," with settings in Australia, "Old Mrs. Wiley," "Insult" which he brought out with J. E. Harold Terry, and "Atonement," a short play.

Kagawa Lauded By The Advance

National Organ Of Congregational Churches Writes On Miss Topping

The Advance, national organ of the Congregational Churches of America, in its issue of Sept. 20, contains the following editorial by R. W. Gamman:

"Mrs. George R. Wilson of Hinsdale, Ill., on her return from visiting Kobe College and some of the mission stations of the Far East last spring, brought with her to this country Miss Helen Topping, secretary to Dr. Kagawa. She has been working with him for seven years, and under his direction, has given especial attention to cooperative movements.

"Dr. Kagawa lays great emphasis upon the co-operative movement in every realm of life. He believes that Christianity will not retain its hold upon the world unless it is able to eliminate the spirit of warfare and to bring those who represent every phase of life to work together. He thinks the cooperative plan of living is the Christian solution of the economic order as over against the capitalistic and communistic plans. He has seven blinds of cooperatives working in Japan. They are Producers, Consumers, Marketing and Transportation, Credit, Utility, Insurance and Mutual Aid.

"Dr. Kagawa's own pamphlets. 'The Economic Foundation of World Peace,' and 'The Christian Internationale,' have been called by the secretary of the Co-operative League of the United States. 'The best that have been published on the co-operative movement.' Miss Topping has these in quantity and they are available from the Kobe Corporation Office, Room 1222, 19 S. LaSalle St., Chicago. It is especially desirable to use these pamphlets in connection with the mission study courses on Japan for the coming year. All of the new Japan mission study books give pages to a description of Kagawa's personality, but hardly mention his teachings concerning co-operation. These mission courses will not be the vital expression of Kagawa's own thought and experience without the addition of his contribution to co-operation already found helpful in many countries.

"Miss Topping is in constant demand for conferences and public meetings. She may be addressed at 19 S. LaSalle St., Chicago, Room 1222."

Low Income Cuts Museum Exhibits

Andrews Puts Reduction At $300,000 Below Normal; Halls Closed Daily

Operating with an income $300,000 below normal, the American Museum of Natural History has been visited by 250,000 more persons this year than during the same period in 1933, Dr. Roy Chapman Andrews, acting director, announced recently. The depression, with its increased leisure and scarcity of money, provides the reason for both conditions, Dr. Andrews said.

The museum's loss in income is accountable partly to a cut of 28 per cent, or $153,000, in the city's contribution; partly to lowered returns on endowment funds, and partly to a falling off in paying memberships, which now number a little less than 12,000.

The increase in visitors, Dr. Andrews believes is made up by persons who, because of unemployment or shortened working hours, have become interested in the museum's "painless education.'

Plan for "Painless Instruction"

"Our idea is to interest people first, then they get their instruction painlessly," he explained. "I am a great believer in painless education. Here at the museum, where there are so many interesting objects catching the eye, education is bound to sift in, whether you notice it or not."

The museum will expand its educational program this Fall under the direction of Mrs. Grace G. Ramsey, acting curator of education. On this side of the institution's activities, 32,000,000 contacts were made with children and adults last year, in formal classes, guided tours, lectures, special exhibits and related projects.

While its educational activities are flourishing, however, the museum finds itself with more treasures than it can afford to show. Of the forty-two halls now in use, ten must be closed each day because the institution cannot pay guards to patrol them or to heat them in cold weather. Different halls are closed each day, but in the meantime new ones, including the Whitney group, which Dr. Andrews declares is the finest collection of birds in the world, cannot be shown for lack of funds.

The new memorial wing of the museum will be opened, possibly on Oct. 27, because it is to be financed by State funds, but the museum's own new extensions are an almost insolvable problem, he said. While there is no money available for new purchases or expeditions, he said, the museum has outstanding exhibits which normally would be on view by now.

Planetarium to Charge Fee

Prospects for the opening of the new Hayden Planetarium next Spring are much brighter, Dr. Andrews asserted. The planetarium is being built with Reconstruction Finance Corporation money and will be turned over to the museum only when, with admission fees and lectures for which a charge of 25 cents will be made, it has paid for itself.

The educational program for this year will include items similar to those of last year, with added courses in astronomy, insect life, crystallography, seashore and pond life, birds and geology, as well as a new course in "Applied Physiology and Health." Students in some of these courses will be able to work with museum exhibits in the public health hall and the new hall of anatomy of man.

Courses carrying "alertness credit" for teachers will be given, some in cooperation with the College of the City of New York, others with New York University.

Attention will be given to artistic values in the museum's Fall program. Finger painting for children will be introduced.

Emphasizing the institution's desire to cooperate with artists who said that beautiful textile designs wish to copy exhibits, Dr. Andrews have been inspired by the coloring of the flamingo group, Indian and other primitive objects.

Referring to a series of four talks to be given for children of members, he explained that this was an important group because it was attended by many adults who would not attend an adult lecture but who take their children.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Break Spikes With His Teeth

Francois Russell does an interesting act for his audiences at the World's Fair in Chicago, not one but two, both of which seem quite impossible to anyone who hasn't actually seen him work. Russell drives a 60-penny nail into a block of wood, and then breaks the nail completely in two with his teeth. The nail is a standard bridge spike, and is subject to inspection by anyone to prove that the nail is a standard iron spike. Then, just for extra measure, Russell takes his bed of sharp spikes, lies back down on the point, and supports three men standing on his chest.

Brown lives in Chevy Chase, Maryland, and works at Magnolia, Maryland, which is just 5 miles away but is across a river where there is no bridge. Consequently, he must walk 2 miles to catch a train for Baltimore, thence back on another train to Magnolia.

Freedom Being Sought By Youth Of Russia

15,000,000 people all told, and their local nationalism cannot be very dangerous to the Soviet State, as the "Great Russians" exceed 100,000,000. Moscow has long looked askance at nationalism in the Ukraine. It has been checked and repressed during the last few years as tending towards separation. Here the present appeal is to patriotism on the broader Pan-Soviet basis, little encouragement being now given to any form of nationalism with a specifically Ukrainian flavor.

The influence of the new nationalism is reflected in the changes of Soviet foreign policy since last year, but its full effect inside Russia cannot yet be diagnosed. Its appeal is chiefly to the rising generation, the much talked of smyena (relief) which must sooner or later take the place of Lenin's Old Guard who engineered the revolution in 1917 and still hold all the important key positions in the party and the Government. Young men and women brought up entirely on Leninism are already beginning to preponderate in many branches of activity. They compose practically all the rank and file and a high proportion of officers in all the fighting forces.

For some years there has been no important organized opposition. The masses in Soviet Russia, both inside and outside the party organizations, have for some years been dominated by the question of food. Their supplies are precarious and may be cut off altogether with hardly any warning. The risks attached to openly disapproving the party's line of action are very great. Malcontents are deprived of their right to draw bread cards and expelled from the rationed zones, potential ringleaders of revolt being enrolled in forced-labor gangs and sent to remote regions. The menace of these penalties has effectively prevented open demonstration of disagreement by the maturer elements in Soviet industry.

The Komsomol is kept free from disloyalty by frequent "purges." The taskks connected with collectivization and the Five-Year Plan have absorbed the surplus enthusiasm of Russia's young people during the last seven years. The call to patriotism, whatever its original cause may have been, is serving the same purpose now. For the first time a new and apparently alien ideal has been added to the original Leninist ideals of Communism, class war, and international revolution.

Polish Dictator Now Europe's 'Mystery Man'

Pilsudski, Key Figure In Diplomacy Riddles, Moves Secretly To Attain Aims

Joseph Pilsudski, who holds the Cabinet rank of Minister of War, has become the mystery man among European statesmen, says Gilbert Redfern in the New York Herald Tribune. While it is customary abroad to refer to him as the Polish dictator, that title, or anything equivalent to it, is never used at home. Nor do the Poles regard him as a dictator, although his authority is unquestioned and his control over the nation's affairs absolute.

Besides being Minister of War, he is inspector general of the army, which means commander-in-chief in time of war, but his supporters declare that his power does not rest on bayonets. It derives, they say, from the implicit confidence and trust which a substantial majority of the Polish people repose in him. He demands, without actually saying it, unswerving loyalty to Marshal Pilsudski from all those who hold public Office, and he gets it without quesion. If he feels that a Prime Minister, or a Cabinet officer, or even Under Secretaries of State are not fulfilling their appointed tasks satisfactorily, the necessary changes are made without the least suspicion of friction or animosity. A discharged Premier, and half a dozen have been fired since the Marshal used the army to regain control of the government in May, 1926, remains to all outward appearance just as loyal in private life as when he was theoretically the Marshal's boss.

In fact, when the Marshal contemplates a Cabinet reconstruction he usually calls into conference all the Premiers who have held office since the May evolution. He does not as rule concern himself with the policies of government departments (other than Foreign Affairs and War), preferring to allow the Ministers in charge to formulate and develop their own policies—in harmony, of course, with the Cabinet as a whole. If the results do not measure up to what the Marshal thinks the nation has a right to expect, the Minister in charge—or the Cabinet as a whole, if the responsibility is general—is quetly dropped. The Constiution says that the Cabinet is responsible to Parliament: actually it is responsible to Pilsudski.

Bloc Controls Parliament

The legislative bodies, known as the Sejm and the Senate, meet regularly as provided for in the Constitution, and the motions of democratic procedure are duly honored. But it is all pantomime because the so-called government bloc, which has a majority in both houses, has "loyalty to the Marshal" as the main plank in its program. The members of the government bloc were elected on a liberal franchise by the free vote of the people, so "loyalty to the Marshal" clearly has the indorsement of a majoriy of the electorate which has exercised its right to vote. If the people had any qualms about the dictatorship, there were plenty of other candidates to vote for besides Pilsudskiists.

The extraordinary feature of the government bloc is its makeup. It's membership in Parliament includes such strking contrasts as representatives of the landed nobility and peasants; large industrialists and labor leaders; Jews and natonalists; Socialists and capitalists. The loyalty to the Marshal which has bound them together through the storms and stresses of the last eight years must have something of a permanent value in it, but it has become increasingly evident of late that the conflicting economic and social interests of the members are weakening the solidarity of the party.

The Marshal has given no sign yet that he is aware of the widening breach between the Right and Left wings of the government bloc, but he has an uncanny instinct for interpreting the public mind, and when he orders the ship of state to shift its course it is a foregone conclusion that public opinion will be with him. The press is free to criticize policy, procedure and results—and does, but it never criticizes the Marshal. Nor does the nation. He does not need a Minister for Propaganda.

Still Keeps Plans Secret

In striking contrast to the general run of dictators, the Marshal loathes ostentation and loud talking. He was raised as a revolutionary in that part of Poland which was under Czarist Russia, and he was graduated from the same kind of school as the Bolshevik leaders. Many of them, in fact, were his classmates. But while they were plotting and bomb-making for the overthrow of Czarist Russia, Pilsudski worked solely for the restoration of Poland. Silence for him was not merely a virtue, it was a vital necessity, and he became one of the world's greatest undercover workers. He still works in the dark and keeps his thoughts to himself He may be seen occasionally walking the short distance from his residence at the Belvedere Palace to his office in the War Department, or in the grounds of the palace. But he never appears at public functions.

President Moscicki, perhaps the most devoted of the Marshal's followers, fulfills all the public duties of a Chief of State. The Marshal does not attend cabinet meetings, and never goes to parliamentary sessions. He does not use the radio, and makes no appeals to the public except at election time, when he may write a few articles for the government newspapers. On such occasions he uses the peturesque language of the common soldier and the peasant.

The last interview he gave to a foreign newspaper man was shortly after the May revolution, and it once took an American newsreel operator nearly a month to get permission to film the Marshal in the grounds of the Belvedere. He even broke all precedent by saying a few words. When a foreign statesman visits Poland the importance of his visit depends upon whether or not he sees the Marshal and how long he stays at the Belvedere. When Louis Barthou, the French Foreign Minister, came to Warsaw in April he had a two-hour conference at the Belvedere and was served tea. All the world quickly knew about it.

Joseph Goebbels, Reich Minister for Propaganda, came on a "private visit" six weeks later and it was announced on the day of his arrival that the Marshal was ill and confined to his room. That meant to the initiated that Dr. Goebbels would not visit the Velvedere. But German officialdom knows that a visit to Warsaw without seeing the Marshal does not enhance the visitor's prestige, and it is said that Dr. Goebbels simply refused to leave until he was received at the Belvedere. He finally saw the Marshal for about twenty minutes, but not before his departure had been postponed for a day—and no tea was served.

Canada Seeks To Widen Scope Of Constitution

Bennett Calls Conference With Aim To Unify Divergent Provincial Codes

Although designed with care from best British patterns and put together with remarkable skill and forethought by the Fathers of Conferation, Canada's machinary of government is showing signs of wear and tear, says a recent the New York Herald Tribune.

It has been functioning admirably since 1867 when the Canadian provinces were wedded politically into one not-so-happy family, and, apart from a half dozen minor adjustments, has given the successive chief engineers on Parliament Hill in Ottawa very little trouble.

Code Still Uncompleted

But recently certain ominous creakings in its innards have well worn parts being replaced with indicated a pressing need for an overhaul, with the likelihood of some modern ones. Prime Minister Richard B. Bennett has already called a conference of provincial experts and they will decide what to do before a serious breakdown occurs.

Chief component of the Dominion's many-wheeled administrative apparatus is the British North America act which in 1867 was drafted and enacted by the statesmen who became known as the Fathers of the Confederation. It is a written delimitation of the respective powers of the federal and provincial governments and an enactment of the terms of the confederaion agreement. But it cannot be regarded as Canada's constitution, although it forms a major part of it. Unlike the United States, her constitution is not wholly written; many unwritten conventions and customs of the British constitution—which has no official existence—are recognized in this country. Decisions of the Supreme Court and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at London constitute the case law of the constitution.

Clashes More Frequent

While the Fathers gave Canada a basis of government which has worked amazingly well they were not prophetically fitted enough to visualize aviation as a major industry, to imagine the development of radio, to foresee the time when any one with out working could demand a subsidy from the state, or obtain financial support in his old age, merely for the asking. Nor did they have any idea that their dominion would develop an intricate industrial society with its problems of working hours and fair wages.

Constitutional changes are required to meet modern-day developments as clashes between federal and provincial authority grow more frequent, and, to the staunch defenders of the inviolability of the British North America act, more and more citizens are asking along with the Hon. H. H. Stevens, when the the present Minister of Commerce, Opposition leader in the House of Commons, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, viewed with alarm establishment of the new marketing board: "What has the Magna Charta got to do with the price of eggs?"

At the forthcoming conference, proposed B. N. A. act revisions will include (1) allocation of sources of revenue so as to eliminate duplicate taxation; (2) surrendering of certain provincial jurisdictions so as to enable the federal government to enact social and industrial legislation, particularly unemployment insurance, minimum wage laws and employment regulation, and (3) elimination of overlapping of jurisdiction in matters of health and agriculture.

Redrafting Sections Urged

According to constitutional authorities, the original intention of the N. B. A. act needs no change. To correct the difficulty giving rise to administrative clashes between Ottawa and the provincial regimes, it is suggested that certain sections be redrafted, having regard to the changed character of business in this country since 1867.

Care will have to be taken, in implementing such proposals as unemployment insurance, that Quebec does not become offended. She does not believe in state orgnization and administration of charity, has no old-age laws, no mothers' allowances.

Even education is regarded as primarily a church concern. Relief is carried on by thousands of Sisters of Charity and members of monastic orders vowed to poverty and therefore doing the work more cheaply than a federal department.

It also must beremembered that without Quebec's acquiescent there would have been no union of the Canadian province, and that her bloc of members in Parliament holds a tremendous voting power by reason of its unity. So that B. N. A. act amendments probably will require unanimous consent of the provinces, and, in addition, a majority vote in both the Senate and House of Commons, just as the United States requires sanction of the state legislatures and of Congress for any amendments to the American Constitution.

Demands of Labor Pressing

Labor has been particularly pressing in its demands for amendments, having carried on a fifteen-year educational campaign. To foster national unity by giving greater power to the federal government to deal with social and labor legislation and to bring about such changes in the constitution of Parliament as may be necessary to make decision of the elected representatives of the people paramount, are two of the reasons for labor seeking revision of the B. N. A. act.

Business men are fighting double taxation made possible by the indefiniteness of the constitution. Litigation has failed to solve the problem. In one case the Privy Council decided that a company with a Dominion charter could do business in any province. In another case it decided that a company with a provincial charter could do business in any other province. Then some provinces discovered they could require companies to take out licenses to hold property within their borders, which several legislatures did.

Such social legislation as old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, regulation of hours and wages, falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but uniformity is necessary for practicability. If any one province adopted pensions, health insurance, workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance, the manufacturer within its borders is at once facing a severe competitive disadvantage.

Prime Minister Mennett at the last session of Parliament admitted that the British Northern America act was a compromise and "compromises are very difficult to change without the consent of all those whose interests may be affected; but any steps we may take,' he said, "will be taken so as not to strain the existing machinery."

After the American-Japan Society luncheon yesterday many took advantage of Count Kabayama's invitation to visit the exhibition of No costumes which the Society for Cultural Relations are sending to the Metropolitan Museum in New York to be exhibited there next spring.

Out of many costumes which were available through the kindness of the greatest collectors in Tokyo, but sixteen were selected, and these are thoroughly characteristic costumes worn on the No stage for both men and women characters. They were hung about the rooms of the Society for Cultural Relations in the Meiji building and made a dazzling array of color and design.

Those who loaned costumes from among their treasures were Baron Takakimi Mitsui, Marquis Goryu Hosokawa, Marquis Toshitame Mayeda, Marquis Yoshioka Tokugawa, Baron Sanemon Konoike and Mr. Kaichiro Nezu.

Patrons of the Hosho School of No for Centuries the Mayeda family collection is one of the largest and finest in the country. Marquis Toshitame Maeda contributed an embroidered silk brocade with a design of iris, water and conventional flowers in gold. Another from this collection was a robe of pale yellow printed in a gold design with delicate embroideries in color.

Another celebrated No house, the Hosokawa, have been patrons of the Kompira school since the beginning of the Tokugawa age, and the Komparu No theater is within the garden of one of the Hosokawa residences.

Marquis Goryo Hosokawa contributed an embroidered silk gauze, the background lines of gold with scattered maple leaves in color. Still another garment loaned by Marquis Hosokawa was a woman's costume in squares of white and old rose, embroidered all over with delicate flowers. An upper garment also loaned by Marquis Hosokawa was of supple gold interwoven with flowers.

Marquis Tokugawa who is a patron of the Gosho school of No actors sent a silk brocade costume of the seventeenth century, faded terra cotta with circles of flowers.

The members of the Mitsui family are known as patrons of the Umewaka School of No, and Baron Takakimi Mitsui gave from his collection an embroidered costume of bright blue with a small bamboo design in gold, and sprays of flowers and decorative circles. He also loaned one of the most ornate costumes, a silk brocade in a large design of butterflies, checks and leaves, gold, silver, red and green.

Still other rare costumes were contributed by Baron Sanemon Konoike and Mr. Kaichiro Nezu.

During the hours when the exhibition was open to specially invited guests, Baron Dan, Mr. Mihara, and Mr. Aoki of the society explained the costumes to the visitors.

French Premier Urges Reform In Government

Doumergue Asks Right To Initiate New Expenditures

More authority for the head of Government, constitutional definition of the rights and duties of civil servants and limitation to the Government of rights to initiate legislation involving expenditures—these were three main planks in the campaign for parliamentary reform announced by Premier Gaston Doumergue over radio to an expectant nation Sept. 24, says a dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor from its Paris correspondent.

Premier Doumergue paid notable tribute to Britain's parliamentary system in the course of his speech. In that "great and noble country," he said, "they have a Prime Minister who is leader. That is why the parliamentary system there has had such a long life," he went on. Both the leader and his Government are insured of a long existence when they take office, he said.

In France, he added, during the 20 months ending last February, one saw six governments come and go—with an average life of three months.

"Premier Ministre"

Whereas the present Parliament only be dissolved with consent of both President and Senate, Premier Doumergue's proposal is that the right of dissolution should vest in the "Premier Ministre"—an office, he commented, which quite wrongly is not even mentioned in the Constitution. In certain cases which he did not specifiy, the Senate's approval would still be necessary. But in general, when the Government is defeated in the Chamber, there should be not merely a reshuffle of ministers, Premier Doumergue said, but an appeal to the country—a general election.

The proposed change is one which has been advocated by a number of prominent people, including M. Andre Tardieu and M. Andre Maurois.

Premier Doumergue's second item—status of the civil service already has aroused a storm of indignation among those affected. While he, did not give the details, he made it clear that civil servants should not have the right to strike.

Again he cited England. There he said they have a group of civil servants who are "disciplined, have well-defined duties and whose revolt against the state would not be easily tolerated." Civil servants and economic security, he went on must be balanced by discipline. They must understand they are servants not masters of the state.

Expenditures

As to the third item—budgetary procedure—Premier Doumergue once more took the cue from British precedent. In Britain, he said, the budget never is a day late. Revenue expenditures are decided by the Government only.

The plan he proposes is to allow no one but the Government to introduce legislation which involves expenditure. If for any reason it is impossible to vote the budget in time the Government should have power, he said, to extend the old budget to cover the period till a new one comes into force.

Premier Doumergue further dealt with what he described as "mischievous maneuvers" in favor of inflation. Socialists and Communists are, he declared, hoping by this means to destroy France and to build their revolution on its ruins. If they succeeded and France went off gold, other countries would defend themselves and then there would be a race of currency depreciation which could only lead to disaster.

Mixed Comment

Premier Doumergue's speech had a very mixed reception in the French press. The Left unanimously describes it as a violent attack on democratic institutions. M. Leon Blum, Socialist leader, however, adds that recent by-election returns have shown the French people are watching lest their personal liberty should be taken away.

A number of Right newspapers on the other hand evidently had not expected the Premier to go so far and are jubilant.

"Papa Gastounet" himself made it clear that he is in earnest about the proposed reforms. "If the verdict goes against me," he said "why should I continue the heavy task I have shouldered?"

Chinese Crabs Invade Waters Of Great Britain

Millions Invade Country, Some Going 400 Miles Inland; Cause Much Damage

One of the strangest of obstacle races recently took place in Great Britain. Millions of Chinese mitten crabs from surrounding waters invaded the country, following streams as far as four hundred miles inland. Efforts proved futile to halt the invasion of the crab army which bit its way through fishermen's nets and crawled on land around obstructing drams. Banks riddled with burrows, and damaged nets and weirs formed only part of the havoc caused by these instruders, who, it is reported, carry parasites capable of causing a lung disease among men and animals.

"Such migrations of crabs are not uncommon," says a bulletin from the Washington, D. C. headquarters of the National Geographic Society. "Land crabs in the Tropics usually live far from the sea, but return to it every year to spawn.

Useful Scavengers

"Each May swarms of crabs inhabiting West Indian hills rattle down over the rocks to the sea, their movements making a din like that of men in armor. Letting nothing impede them, they even invade houses which block their descent. After spawning, they return to the hills, and later, thousands of young crabs are found clinging to shore rocks.

"Although set crabs often devour oysters from entire beds, and in the Tropics, land crabs cause serious damage to sugar cane plantations, rice fields and gardens, they are more useful than harmful to man. Certain omnivorous species, acting as scavengers, help to keep our shores clean. The crab family's adopted member, the Horseshoe Crab, which contains ammonia, is used as food for livestock, and is ground into fertilizer.

Clever Camouflage

"To escape their many enemies, crabs have developed clever methods of defense. Some go in heavily for camouflage. The mud crab smears mud on its back or changes the color of its shell to match the bottom. The small gray fiddler crabs scuttling warily over a beach pretty closely match wet sand; but for additional protection they dig themselves into burrows, piling the excavated sand into neat pellets near the entrance. Shells of some crabs are pitted to resemble the coral or gravel among which they live. The Gulf-weed Crab, which Columbus found clinging to seaweed floating in the Saragasso Sea, is olive green to blend with the plant.

"Crabs change their costumes at will. A Spider Crab, wearing a coat of growing seaweed, when placed in an aquarium of sponges, will carefully pick off all the seaweed and plant in its place, pieces of sponge. "The legs of crabs are often flattened for shoveling sand, enlarged for fighting, or developed into paddles for swimming. The rear two pairs of legs of a furry, clumsy-looking crab on the Pacific coast are modified to extend over his back. This enables him to hold over him a protective umbrella of sponge, mangrove leaf, or mullusk shell.

"In Naples, people are not surprised to see small red sponges runing along the shore. Crabs living within them furnish the locomotion. Some crabs live inside coral, which has grown up around them, imprisoning them, while others exist surrounded by a living blanket of anemones. One resourceful crab carries an anemone like a bouquet in each of his two front claws.

"This ability of the crab to resemble, not himself, but 'two other fellows,' reaches top notch in the Devil Mask Crab, grooves in its carapace bearing uncanny resemblance to the features of a human face.

Some Weigh 30 Pounds

"Crabs vary in size from the tiny parasitic Pea Crab found in oysters to the Giant Spider Crab lurking in deep water off Japan, whose sprawling legs are nearly six feet long and whose weight sometimes reaches thirty pounds.

"Crabs vary greatly in belligerence. The Blue Crab, which appears on menus during its molting season as 'soft-shelled crab,' is one of the most powerful and pugnacious. It burrows in the sea bottom, pouncing like a cat on its prey. One species of edible crab, when molested, plays possum, drawing all its ten legs under its body, and allowing itself to be rolled about like an inert ball.

"The Hermit Crab, which is more closely related to crayfish and lobsters than crabs, is so pugnacious that it is nicknamed the Soldier Crab. Since its soft hind body without protective armor makes it easy prey for fish, the Hermit Crab wedges it into a deserted spiral shell which serves as a portable shelter. With just a few slender walking legs outside, and with his large claw drawn up like a shield in front of them, the Hermit Crab is well protected. Unfortunately he grows, and about twice a year has to find a new and larger covering. Tightly clutching his old shell, he will try on one shell after another until he finds one that fits. When no shells are available, large Hermit Crabs have been known to wear pieces of waterlogged bamboo, or even halves of coconut shells.

"The female Hermit Crab, which is only about one-sixth the size of the male, usually rides on top of his shell, firmly held by his claw to prevent another male from stealing her.

"A large cousin of the Hermit Crab is the Coconut or Robber Crab, which lives on islands of the Pacific and Indian oceans. These crabs do not wear a protecting shell, but are so powerful that specimens confined in biscuit tins have punched holes in the tin. At night they emerge from their underground burrows lined with coconut husks to feed on the pulp of coconuts. They are said to obtain the pulp by hammering a hole in one end of the nut. Some observers state that the crabs climb lofty palms to procure the nuts."

The first meeting of the Asiatic Society for the ensuing year took place at the German Club Wednesday afternoon when Miss Florence Wells gave an interesting talk on the history and evolution of fans.

In the absence of the vice-president, Mr. A. K. Reifschauer, Mr. W. B. Cunningham presided, and introducing the speaker referred to her wide knowledge of the subject.

Miss Wells related legends and stories of fans and traced their origins, explaining their many and varied uses. She read translations of poems about fans, and also verses inscribed upon them.

She began by describing how her curiosity had been aroused by the subject, for fans were as frequently used in winter as they were in summer. The fan was a part of the equipment of a bride, who could not do without one in her obi. Everywhere in Japan Miss Wells said she found the fan a symbol of congratulation, and the fan was used to point out auspicious things rather than with the hands.

Just as people possessed ancestors so fans did also, said Miss Wells, and she pointed out how the leaf was the first ancestor of the fan in Japan. First the shade of a tree gave shelter, then men carried away a leaf, and last the leaf was used to swat insects. Although widely separated the leaf fans used in Hawaii and the South Seas is identical. Palm leaves were used and finally the handle was decorated.

Miss Wells mentioned many varieties of Yedo fans, One of the largest she showed was used to dip in water to cool the air, or when coming out of the bath it was employed to fan the father dry.

In Yedo days, the speaker continued, the fan peddler did a good trade on the streets and was a picturesque figure. She quoted from a poem about him. "A load of wind upon his shoulders, but oh! how hot he is! the Fan Peddler!"

Miss Wells traced the history of fans in China, India and Egypt, giving much unfamiliar information, and her remarks concerning the fan used in umpiring wrestling games in Japan was most illuminating.

From a large collection of fans which she had brought to illustrate her lecture, Miss Wells showed heavy samurai fans, those used in the dance, festival and ceremonial fans, and finally she told her audience about the folding, wooden fans used by court ladies with which it was the custom to hide their faces. In early Meiji this custom was done away with, but the fan was carried closed and wound about with cords of five colors.

A lively description followed of how Miss Wells came to buy the largest fan in her collection, a fan shop sign, 105 years old. From the abundant material at her disposal Miss Wells has explored her subject thoroughly, and presented it in an entertaining manner.

Crop Estimates In Manchoukuo Below Last Year

Great Difficulty In Getting Data; Bandits And Floods Affect Agricultural Progress

One of the greatest difficulties to be met with in estimating the crop prospects of cereals in North Manchuria has always been the question of the sown area, as owing to the total absence of a land authority and the distribution of land amongst a great number of separate owners, whose interest is to show less ground than they have actually sown, for the purpose of paying less land tax, this has constantly led to the fact that there was always great uncertainty as to the approximation of sowings in every region, besides which there was a great diversion in the figures received from various sources. Added to the above facts, military actions, bandits and flood have very seriously interfered with the normal trend of local agriculture, says F. H. Bert in the North China Daily News. At one time it was possible to arrive at some fairly reasonable data, basing same on the increase in colonization and area, but now this has become absolutely impossible.

It has also to be taken into consideration that under present conditions it is difficult to get into contact with the villages in the main centers, and, consequently, much less is known of the conditions of agriculture than in former days Changes in local administration and the closing up of many of the old grain firms has further aggravated the situation, as the newcomers, both officials and settlers, are but little acquainted with local conditions.

In consequence of this, the most contradictory statements have been received this year regarding the sown area and the prospects of the crop for 1934. Taking Tsinkang as an example, the administration of that district states that there has been a slight increase in the sown area in 1934—198,438 shan in 1933 and 202,065 shan in 1934—but the local agricultural society gives contrary figures, stating that there were 163,000 shan sown in 1933, and that this year the sown area has fallen to 107,800 shan. There are many examples of a similar nature, in which there is a great difference of opinion between the district administration and agricultural societies, while he figures of grain firms are most uncertain and express the most contradictory views.

Differences In Estimates

It would be thought that for large territories, and more particularly for the whole of North Manchuria, mistakes would, more or less, equalize each other, but the example of last year proves that this is not the case.

Taking the estimates of the crop made in 1933 by the C.E.R. Economic Bureau, as well as by the S.M.R. Research Department, it will be found that they were considerably exaggerated, even for the whole of North Manchuria, as the correspondents of both of these departments considerably overestimated the sown area for tha year, and in making estimates for 1934 this must be allowed for, as well as the fact that floods have considerably interfered with the sown area.

According to figures received from the correspondents of the C.E.R. Bureau, the area sown during the past few years has gradually decreased, as may be seen from the following figures.

Alterations in the total of sown area in relation to 1931 reckoning 1931 as 100:

	1932	1933	1934
Tsitsihar	80.3	76.2	72
Anta	85.8	90.5	84.3
Harbin	92.9	86.2	87
Lower Sungari	89.5	93.1	84.8
Southern	93.3	83.8	84.8
Eastern	88.7	77.4	69.4
Total	90.1	86.0	81.1

From this table it will be seen that in all districts gravitating towards the C.E.R. the average decrease in sown area is 18.9 per cent, the maximum being seen on the Eastern line, which shows a decrease of 30.6 per cent, and in the Tsitsihar region, which shows a decrease of 29 per cent, but owing to several or the districts in the Tsitsihar region not having sent in any estimates, the figures cannot be considered as very reliable.

Total Sown Area

The hypothetical dimension of the total sown area in thousands of hectares for the above district may be estimated as follows:

Hypothetical dimension of total shown area shown in thousands of hectares:

	1931	1932	1933	1934
Tsitsihar	922	740	690	665
Anta	1,696	1,625	1,535	1,430
Harbin	1,659	1,540	1,430	1,445
L. Sungari	1,180	975	1,100	970
Southern	1,714	1,600	1,435	1,453
Eastern	1,272	1,130	985	885
Total	8,443	7,460	7,175	6,850

The figures of correspondents for 1933 estimated the total sowing at 7,660,000 hectares, but the estimate made out by the C.E.R. Bureau of 7,715,000 hectares was a much more correct one, while in the present year the figures sent in by the same correspondents are also exceedingly optimistic, as they place the sown area of North Manchuria at 685,000 hectares, or a decrease of only 4.5 per cent against last year in 7,660,000 hectares, while the official data of the S.M.R. Research Department and the Manchoukuo Government makes the decrease 6.3 per cent.

Considerable Loss Fearde

It should be remembered that most of the replies received from correspondents were sent in the end of July and the beginning of August, at a time when it was quite impossible to estimate the ruin and damage done to the sowings by the flood, but it has already been estimated that the flooded fields represented more than 90 per cent of the total sown area, and, therefore, the damage must be very considerable.

The area to be harvested from wheat is approximately about 63 per cent of 1931, and that of other cereal about 80 per cent and in comparison with last year the area to be harvested from beans has decreased by 21 per cent, wheat by 14 per cent and other cereals by 3 per cent.

Judging from data received it is possible that wheat will be giving a better yield from a unit of area than it did last year, while beans and kaoliang will give about same result, and on the whole, the crop prospects of the main five cereals for the present year have every appearance of being worse than those of last year, while last year's crop was below the average of the past ten years.

Traffic in Opium Shows Need Of Greater Vigilance

Reports To League Board Disclose Discrepancies In Export Data

To consider its report to the League on the world's narcotic situation the Permanent Central Opium Board has met in Geneva according to the Christian Science Monitor. It is asserted that some progress is being made in a matter which concerns every country, though there are to be observed regrettable complications which hamper the work, and detract from the satisfactory operation of the general agreements. The information provided does not always make pleasant reading.

For example, it is pointed out that there are comparatively large stocks of raw opium in both the producing and manufacturing countries, and there is need for greater vigilance.

The board, which by Article 14 of the convention of 1931 has important responsibilities in cases where a country imports certain drugs in excess of the statement of estimates of the supervisory body, hopes with further experience to elaborate a suitable and efficient system on the basis of its present practice. It therefore hopes to receive complete data from all countries if the system is to work successfully. At least four countries had failed to submit data for 1933.

Increase in Manufacture

In examining the figures of manufacture, the board found that last year there was a general increase in the manufacture of morphine and cocaine, particularly the former. The number of manufacturing countries has increased from 20 to 21, with the resumption of the manufacture of cocaine in Formosa.

As regards morphine, seven countries—United Kingdom, France, Germany, Switzerland, U.S.S.R., the United States, and Japan—manufactured last year more than one ton, or nearly 90 per cent of the reported, world manufacture. Six countries—United Kingdom, France, Germany, Switzerland, Japan and Korea—manufactured 96 per cent of the reported manufacture of diacetylmorphine, 1295 kilograms. Eight countries—Belgium, United Kingdom, Germany, France, Netherlands, Switzerland, the United States and Japan—manufactured 94 per cent of the cocaine, 3773 kilograms.

World stocks of cocaine appeared slightly to decrease, while morphine stocks increased (17 per cent).

World consumption appeared to show a decrease in cocaine and diacetymorphine and an increase in morphine (4 per cent).

Discrepancies in Reports

The report deals with discrepancies between reported exports and reported imports. The discrepancies are particularly large in respect of coca leaves, which the board attributed to the failure of several exporting counries in submitting their statistics. Likewise the statistical situation in regard to the international movement of raw opium was not considered by the board as satisfactory.

Seizures have been effected by the various governments of illicit imports. Large quantities of raw opium were seized in France, the U. S. S. R., Hongkong, India and China, as well as lesser quantities in a number of other places. The largest seizure of morphine was reported from the United States. Indian hemp and Indian hemp resin were seized in considerable quantities in Egypt, India, Straits Settlements and the U. S. S. R.

The increased seizures, the board considers, may indicate a stricter control by the national authorities rather than an increase in the illicit traffic.

It is obvious, when the best gloss has been put on this statement, that more vigorous action by the board and more complete cooperation by the governments are necessary if the traffic in dangerous drugs is to be reduced and eventually suppressed.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Fifty Billion

Between 1918 and 1923 Germany effected the debasement of her currency known as the German inflation. By November 1923 this debasement had reached such proportions that 1,000,000,000 marks was worth only 24 cents in American money. A memento of those days is the postage stamp in my cartoon having a face value of 50,000,000,000 marks. At the old parity this single postage stamp would have sufficed to pay the Allied debts to the United States (the principal of which amounts to $9,850,149,802.95). The single stamp also exceeds the total of all cash (gold) held by the banks and treasures of 49 countries constituting the civilized world. (The total so held is (in round figures) $11,936,000,000 based on the old gold parity of $20.67 per ounce troy).

To Be Out On Bail

Mr. Chuzo Mitsuchi, former Minister of Railways, who was imprisoned some time ago on a charge of perjury in connection with the so-called Finance Ministry scandal, will be bailed out before the special Diet session is summoned, according to Nippon Dempo.

3 Nations Repeat Stand On Austria

France, Italy And Great Britain Sign New Statement On Need For Independence

A new declaration in respect to Austria has been signed by representatives of France, Italy and Great Britain. It is far from being as strong as was expected and carries Austrian protection little further than the present stage.

An official communique given out shows that the note says merely that, having examined the Austrian situation anew, the representatives of the three countries have agreed on behalf of their governments to endorse the declaration of Feb. 17 concerning the necessity of maintaining the independence and integrity of Austria according to existing treaties, says the New York Times. That declaration still retains all its strength and will continue to inspire their common policy.

The declaration, while not all that was hoped for, is represented as providing a basis for future developments. The hope is expressed that the Little Entente countries, including Yugoslavia, with possibly Hungary in addition, may be induced to subscribe to it. If that can be brought about, the matter of giving effect to the declaration by prescribing measures to be taken in case of a new threat to Austrian independence can be devised in future conversations in Paris and Rome.

British Statement

Despite rumors from Geneva to the effect that the British Government has finally agreed to commit itself to join action with France and Italy to assure the integrity of Austria, the Foreign Office insists there has been no change in the attitude of this government since Feb. 17.

Since it joined in the statement of Feb. 17 the British Government has on various occasions emphatically declared that it had made no commitments to implement it by any action to preserve Austrian independence. The official announcement in Geneva is interpreted here as merely a repetition of what the three governments said last February, and British officials still adhere to the former assertion that they have made no new commitments.

Hajime Hoshi Is Given Ovation By His Many Friends

Famous Japanese Industrialist Leaves For United States On Tatsuta Maru

To wish him bon voyage on his trip to the United States to sell quinine some 600 friends of Mr. Hajime Hoshi, president of the Hoshi Pharmaceutical Company, Ltd., assembled at the Japan Industrial Club Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Hoshi left on the Tatsuta Maru which sailed from Yokohama at 3 p.m. today. Several hundred friends and company employees were at the pier to see him off.

Sponsors to the reception Wednesday were several leading Japanese. They were Mr. Koki Hirota, the Foreign Minister; Mr. Mitsuru Toyama, the famous Japanese patriot; Mr. Takejiro Tokonami, Minister of Communications; Mr. Ryutaro Nagai, former Minister of Overseas Affairs; Mr. Magoichi Tawara, former Minister of Commerce and Industry; Mr. Keisuke Mochizuki, former Minister of Communications; Mr. Ryohei Uchida, president of the Kokuryu-Kai (Black Dragon Society), and Mr. Shigemaru Sugiyama, influential political figure.

Magoshi Chairman

Chairman at the reception was Mr. Magoshi who opened and closed the speech making. Mr. Hirota, Japan's Foreign Minister, paid tribute to the energy and indomitable courage of Mr. Hoshi who, in spite of adversities, was carrying on his large schemes. Mr. Mochizuki also endorsed the character of Mr. Hoshi, stating that though the industrialist had been through difficult times, there never was any question as to the integrity of his character or his personal credit.

Mr. Nagai then spoke at length stating that adversity, like pressure on the atmosphere, only seemed, in the case of Mr. Hoshi, to have increased the force of his power and energy which under no trial or tribulations have ever acknowledged defeat. He also remarked that the presence of so many hundred persons was evidence of the influence and power of Mr. Hoshi's dynamic personality which had drawn so many persons active and busy in life to come to the reception.

Determined to Succeed

Mr. Hoshi replied stating that he was greatly moved by the presence of his many friends, and that he was determined to succeed with his plans of reconstructing the fortunes of the vast industrial enterprise which he had built up and which had been passing through such difficulties. He stated that his present trip was in order to interest American business in the quinine mountain which the company held in Taiwan. Mr. Hoshi bought vasts tracts of land many years ago and had them planted with quinine seedlings which have now grown up, making the estate of very great value.

A the close of the meeting banzai were given for Mr. Hoshi, the cheers being led by Mr. Tawara.

trusted with our care, from the least to the greatest, have won more than our gratitude: they have won our affection.

Praises Japanese

"Your wonderful, orderly, efficient and patient Japanese people, your picturesque country, your clean and interesting cities, your unbounded welcome, and unparalleled courtesy have impressed us and made us your admirers.

"And now, excellencies and people of Yokohama, from the bottom of our hearts, each and every member of the American Press Party feels a personal gratitude beyond our power to repay. It was you who welcomed us to Japan. It is you who say Good bye. Between those occasions we have enjoyed experiences and made friendship which most certainly will result in better understanding and greater friendship between our nations. Our appreciation to you, to all our hosts, and to all Japan is deep and genuine. If engrossed on parchment or hewn upon stone we could say no more—nor could we be more sincere."

After the banquet, motion pictures taken on the travels of the party were screened by the welcome committee.

Hauptmann's Wall St. Deals $264,000 In '33

Speculated On Margins Under Wife's Maiden Name With Steiner, Rouse Co.

The stock market speculations of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, who is held on a charge of extorting $50,000 ransom in the Lindbergh kidnapping case, totaled $264,000 for 1933, it was learned recently from an official source, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The $264,000 figure does not mean that Hauptmann had anywhere near that amount to his credit at any time, but it does indicate the frenzied activity of the once impoverished carpenter.

Trading under the maiden name of his ex-waitress wife, Hauptmann bought and sold frequently throughout the year. At first he scalped some profits, but when the books were closed at the end of the year his luck had failed him and he was in the red. Exactly how much he sank in Wall Street is a secret; his initial "investment" was about $10,000 and he carried a line of stocks on margin. He had opened an account at the Yorkville branch of Steiner, Rouse and Co. in April, 1932, just after Col. Charles A. Lindbergh paid a $50,000 ransom in the hope of buying back his son.

Lived Life of Luxury

As befitted a big-time speculator, Hauptmann stepped up his frugal standard of living. He and Mrs. Hauptmann made an automobile trip to Florida in January and February, 1933; his wife made a trip back to Germany that summer, and in October of that year Hauptmann went hunting in the Maine woods. When not hunting in Maine or Wall Street, he paddled his canoe out at City Island.

The listing of the serial numbers of the ransom money which ultimately led to the arrest of Hauptmann was credited last night to the insistence, of agents of the intelligence unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, headed by Elmer L. Irey, of Washington, who were active in the kidnapping case from the beginning.

The $50,000 ransom money, it was learned, was assembled at the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co., in which Colonel Lindbergh's father-in-law, Dwight W. Morrow, had been a partner. The original plan was to turn over an ordinary batch of currency to the extortioners.

Checking of Money Opposed

Colonel Lindbergh and his intermediary, Dr. John F. Condon, having pledged their word not to cause trouble if the child would be returned safely, were said to have opposed recording the serial numbers. But the revenue agents, who appreciated from experience how valuable the serial numbers would be in tracing suspects, insisted that the serial numbers be jotted down, and, moreover, that all the bills be brand new and all the $10 and $20 bills be gold certificates—this to make them easier to recognize.

The serial numbers were broadcast all over the country. Later came President Roosevelt's proclamation forbidding further use of gold certificates. The odds were thus doubly stacked against Hauptmann, but he continued to spend his yellowbacks until an intelligent filling station manager wrote Hauptmann's automobile license number across one bill. That was the end for Hauptmann.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Childless 11 Days

In 1582 Pope Gregory XIII effected a reform of the Julian Calendar by dropping 10 days erroneously accumulated since 46 B. C. This reform was not introduced into England and its colonies until 1752, when 11 days (September 3-13) had to be dropped and September 14 immediately followed September 2nd.

Since September 3 to 13 were non-existent that year, if follows that no children were born in England and its colonies during these 11 days.

The River Of Blood

The "Mina de Sangre" is located near the village of Virtud, Dept. of Gracias, Honduras, where it touches San Salvador and Guatemala. The phenomenon takes place in a little cave, whence a constant stream of a red liquid forms into a river of blood. The liquid has the odor, color, taste and consistency of blood. It coagulates when removed from the river, and corrupts in 24 hours. Bats, vampires and savage dogs, feed upon it with avidity. Diluted with water it was analysed by Doctor Silliman, Jr., who held that the curious phenomenon was due to some red infusoria.

Miss Bollert Of U.B.C. Returns To Victoria After Visit In Tokyo

Rengo

VICTORIA, CANADA.—Filled with a great admiration for the business and cultural "efficiency" of Japan, Miss Mary L. Bollert, Dean of Women at the University of British Columbia, has returned here after attending a conference in Tokio for the promotion of cultural relations between Japan and North America. The conference was held at the invitation of the Japanese Foreign Office.

"My impression of Japan was of a nation keyed up to the highest pitch of efficiency," said Miss Bollert when she returned here. "Industrially, as everyone knows, Japan is forging ahead. She is also making tremendous strides in educational matters, and Tokio has many great schools and universities, with thousands of pupils."

One of the main problems which is engrossing the attention of Dean Bollert is that of the second generation of Japanese—those Japanese born in Canada and the United States of Japanese parents, who, after their education on this continent, has been completed, return to Japan to find employment.

"The Japanese authorities," said Miss Bollert, are very much concerned over this question, and it is hoped as a result of the Tokio conference that some solution may be found.

"It seems the Japanese born in this continent," explained Miss Bollert, "speak very bad Japanese, and are counted illiterate when they return to their own country.

The Japan-Sweden Society gave a dinner Friday evening in honor of the Swedish delegates to the International Red Cross Society at the Industrial Club. The guests of honor were Baron and Baroness Stjernstedt, Mr. and Mrs. E. de Bergengren, and the Swedish Minister and Madame Hultman also honored the occasion with their presence.

Mr. Ginjiro Fujihara, president of the Japan-Swedish Society in presiding proposed a toast to the King of Sweden, and the Swedish Minister replied with a toast to His Majesty the Emperor. Adolf Gerdts vice-president of the society proposed a toast to the Imperial Prince and Princesses. An address of welcome was given by Mr. Fujihara, and a response made by Baron Stjernstedt.

After dinner the guests were entertained by a company of jugglers and other amusements.

Those present were: Baron and Baroness Stjernstedt, Mr. and Mrs. E. de Bergengren, the Swedish Minister and Madame Hultman, Mr. Ginjiro Fujihara, President; Mr. Edmund Andree and Mrs. Andree, Mr. Ragnvald Bagge and Mrs. L. Bagge, Mr. Frik Brauns, Baron Ino Dan, Mr. N. H. Ericson, Mr. Yasunosuke Fukukita and Mrs. Fukukita, Mr. Adolf Gerdts, Mrs. M. Gerdts and Miss Gerdts, Mr. Knut A. Gustafsson, Mr. Gosta Guston, Mr. Cyril Harden, Mr. Gosta Hemming and Mrs. Hemming, Mr. Bertil Johanson, Mr. N. F. Kallin, Mr. Takemaro Kaneko, Dr. Akira Kusaba, Mr. Yoshiji Nagashima, Mr. Kinichi Yamaguchi, Mr. Jinnosuke Takaku, Mr. Seichi Takashima and Mrs. Takashima, Baron Yasushi Togo and Baroness Togo; Mr. G. Wester, and Mr. Takeo Yamagata.

Mr. Fujihara's address was as follows:

"The Japan-Sweden Society has had, since its inception five years ago, the privilege and pleasure of welcoming a number of distinguished business men, scholars and engineers from Sweden. But it is the first time for us to have an opportunity of coming in contact with messengers of peace and humanity from that country. I refer to Baron Stjernstedt and Mr. Bergengren, who are now in Tokyo attending the International Red Cross Conference as Swedish Delegates. It is particularly significant that our dinner party this evening is honored by the presence of Baroness Stjernstedt and Mrs. Bergengren, who have come to Japan with their husbands.

"That Sweden is a foremost nation devoted to the cause of peace and humanity is so well-known that it would be quite out of place for me to dwell upon this matter at length. But permit me to congratulate the government and people of Sweden, who have made notable contributions toward the peace of the world and the welfare of mankind, upon the fact that they are so ably represented at the Conference. I am confident that these distinguished representatives of Sweden will play an important part in making the present international gathering a great success.

"I would not be so presumptuous as to feel that Japan has anything superior to teach the visitors from overseas. I venture to hope, however, that our guests of the evening will see with their own eyes that the Japanese are interested in the welfare of mankind just as vitally, if not more, as any other nation in the world. Japan is a small country with a teeming population, which makes it necessary for the people to work hard. We are deeply interested in the cultural side of our national life in spite of the strenuous struggles for existence, in which the whole nation is engaged by necessity. Culture goes hand in hand with peace and humanity. The fact that various phases of our ancient culture have come down to the present generation in active forms, not as dead institutions, proves better than anything else that Japan has stood for peace and humanity for centuries.

"Baron Stjernstedt and Mr. Bergengren are, of course, familiar as official representatives with the activities of the Japanese Red Cross. But personally it is my sincere hope that Baroness Stjernstedt and Mrs. Bergengren, who do not have to attend the Conference so regularly as their husbands, will make a minute survey and appreciate the peaceful aspect of the various institutions in this country.

"In conclusion, I again express my hope that our guests of the evening will continue in their service to the noble cause, and I ask all our members to join me in drinking to their health."

Baron Stjernsted's reply was as follows:

One behalf of the Swedish Red Cross delegation I wish to extend to the president and members of the Japan-Sweden Society our heart-felt thanks for your wonderful reception this evening, for the kind words of welcome just tendered us and for giving us this opportunity to enjoy your hospitality, so well known to Swedish visitors to your lovely country.

Before leaving for Japan we were repeatedly told that we were to be met by friends everywhere, friends who would only be too pleased to take care of us and anticipate our wants and wishes. I must frankly admit, however, that in spite of having as a consequence perhaps placed our expectations on a higher level, we are simply overwhelmed by what has and is being done on all hands for us Red Cross visitors.

Words fail me to express adequately how much we strangers have appreciated the courtesies constantly shown us by high and low, and how difficult it will be to reciprocate in even the smallest way the extensive hospitality that we have had the honor to receive. That this is also the feeling of all my colleagues to the Red Cross Conference I can assure you, and I can only repeat what our president, Judge Payne, said to His Majesty the Emperor the other day:

'Japan is such a lovely country that I should like to remain here forever.'

This is exactly the way we all feel, but unfortunately shall soon have to depart from your shores, but our memories of our stay with you shall last for ever. Responding to the kind words, that you Mr. President directed to Mr. Bergengren and myself, I can but assure you that it would be the greatest honor to us if our participation in the international Red Cross conference may in some way have contributed to the preservation of peace and to the welfare of mankind throughout the world.

I thank you all once more for all you have done for us during our unfortunately short stay in Japan and I Raise my Glass in a toast for the future welfare and success of the Japan-Sweden society."

London Searches For Identities Of Span Builders

Treasure Hunt Going On For Box Containing Record Of Waterloo Bridge

Amid the roar of traffic and the hurrying millions of Britain's capital a treasure hunt is taking place, according to the London Correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

The hunters of the treasure are workmen who are helping to demolish Waterloo Bridge. The treasure is a box which, records say, was cemented into the bridge 114 years ago and which contains the answer to a very vexed question of the real identity of the builder of the bridge. Is it Rennie, the architect whose masterpiece the bridge has long been supposed to be, or George Dodds, the original architect called in by the contractors?

Dodds vs. Rennie

George Doods is understood to have been first employed by the Strand Bridge Company to prepare designs. Disagreement of some kind appears to have taken place and Dodds was dismissed and Rennie called in. Some architects think that Rennie owed much to Dodds, merely carrying on his work.

Meanwhile there is quite considerable excitement among the workmen on Waterloo Bridge as to where, when, and by whom the valuable little box will be found. There is absolutely no clue as to where the box was placed. It is considered most probable that it will be found in the masonry of the arch structure which has so far not been disturbed.

So a bridge is up—or down—for sale, and after 117 years of hard service to the public. The old bridge was built entirely of stone, and some of the pieces in the coping weigh over half a ton.

Old Habit

This scattering of fragments of its discarded bridges and other famous landmarks is a confirmed habit with London. Fragments of Old London Bridge, for instance, which lasted from 1209 to 1832, were eagerly sought after. An archway went to Guy's Hospital, some of the balustrading was divided between Gravesend and Victoria Park while some of the larger stones were built into the pier at Herne Bay, Kent.

Temple Bar, last surviving of the old city gates, was not however, scattered like so much confetti about the country but honorably reerected as one of the entrance gates to Theobalds Park, Herefordshire. Similarly Aldgate went to Northumberland and Newgate to Renfrew in Scotland.

When they pulled down old Hungerford Bridge, Charing Cross, in the 'fifties of last century, parts of it went all the way to Bristol and were used in the Clifton Suspension Bridge over the Avon Gorge.

And now Waterloo Bridge is the latest of London's old servants to come on to the second-hand market.

What will happen this time? Waterloo Bridge is hardly the thing to transport bodily to the grounds of some noble lord, like old Temple Bar. And would park authorities nowadays relish an odd arch or a few yards of balustrading?

Mexico Opens Its $9,000,000 Fine Arts Palace

Film Stars From Hollywood See President Rodriguez Dedicate Huge Project

President Abelardo Rodriguez formally opened on Sept. 29 Mexico's vast National Palace of Fine Arts, a sumptuous theater, concert hall and art gallery begun more than twenty years ago during the Presidency of Porfirio Diaz. The government has spent $9,000,000 on it. Ramon Novarro, Dolores Del Rio, Douglas Fairbanks and other motion picture stars were here for the opening, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The President headed a gathering of political, diplomatic and social leaders at the inauguration of what is to be a center of national cultural work extending to all the nation. In contrast to the well dressed members of the Presidential party was a mass chorus of 700 men and women in working clothes. The chorus sang "The Ballad of the Revolution" to the accompaniment of a 100-piece orchestra, which played "The Proletarian Symphony," composed by Professor Carlos Chavez.

Deputies Refuse Single Seats

The only note of discord in the proceedings was sounded when 200 members of the Chamber of Deputies refused to occupy their seats in the theater because each had received only one ticket so their families could not be present. The Deputies last night censured the fine arts department of the Ministry of Education for "disrespect toward a public assembly," charged that the best seats had been given to families connected with the aristocracy of the Diaz regime and said that "the Revolutionary members of Congress can not tolerate the disrespect of being placed in the gallery."

The opening ceremonies began when President Rodriguez remarked in a brief address that completion of the building had been one of the major features of his administration's program. Antonio Castro Leal, head of the Fine Arts Department, delivered the dedicatory address, saying: "Art is a weapon and poetry frequently a precursor of great social changes." Since culture must be universal, he said, the Minstry of Education would not exclude foreign artists of actors.

A secret session of Congress recently criticized Leal for spending huge sums to attract foreign attractions "while our own artists starve."

End of Capitalism Chanted

Then stirring modernistic music filled the theater, with the great chorus chanting "Thus will be the proletarian revoltuion!" Since the theater holds only 2,000 persons, a large crowd outside heard through loud speakers the words: "And there won't be those above and those below, for equality will come through work and there will be bread for all."

After the ceremonies the President was conducted on a tour of the building's many art galleries and salons.

Conductor Finds Composition Lags

Conditions In Central Europe Handicap Creative Artists, Says Koussevitzky

Conditons in Central Europe are at a low point, so far as offering opportunity and inspiration for creative writing, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said on his return to America on the Ile de France from his vacation abroad. Unrest, suspicion and sheer want make the path of the composer extremely difficult, he said.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has long identified himself as a seeker for music by new writers, makes his vacation party a search for fresh talent. He said that he had interviewed many musicians, both creative and executant, and he had come away with depressing impressions. He did not know when there could be hope for a reversal of the present trend.

Nevertheless, he will introduce a number of new foreign and native compositions this season both in Boston and New York. He was emphatic in his statement of his intention to continue his custom of giving contemporary composers a hearing.

The two most important American works will be Nicolai Berezowsky's new 'cello concerto, with Gregor Platigorsky as soloist, and Roy Harris's Second Symphony. From abroad, Mr. Boussevitzky has brought Igor Stravinsky's "Persephone," which has been played only in Paris, and G. Francesco Malipiero's Symphony, "in four tempos, like the four seasons," which has been played only in Florence.

Stravinsky Is Expected

"Persephone" will call for a chorus, narrator and tenor soloist. The work has a poem by Andre Gide. The composer, Mr. Koussevitzky said, will be here for the first American performance of the score in February. Stravinsky also will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for one week, when he will direct his own "Le Sacre du Printemps" and the first performance here of his "Le Baise de la Fee. Adrian Boult, British conductor, will be another guest leader.

Mr. Koussevitzky was not certain whether he would bring "Persephone" to New York, but he planned definitely to give the other three compositions in the Boston Symphony's concerts in Carnegie Hall.

Malipiero will also be represented on the Boston's programs by his violin concerto. A young American violinist, Miss Viola Mitchell, who has established a considerable reputation in various sections of Europe with this work, will make her American debut with it, he said. A number of other works, both of American and European origin, are being considered and their addition to the programs will be announced later.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The First Boycott

The boycott was derived from the name of Captain Charles C. Boycott, an agent for Lord Erne of County Mayo, Ireland, in the time when the Irish Land League struggled with the English landlords. The harsh exactions of Captain Boycott, who evicted many tenants for non-payment of high rent, led the tenantry to organize on September 19, 1880 for the purpose of having no dealings with Captain Boycott and his family. This organized ostracism reduced Captain Boycott to dire straits and compelled him to leave the country. Ever since, boycott came to mean a system of organized ostracism permitting no social or commercial dealings with a political enemy.

Turkish Ruler May Wed Sister Of Albanian King

of one another. Senie is twenty-six, Myzeyen twenty-five, Ruthie twenty-four and Mahide twenty-three. Two older sisters, Adile and Nafie, were married some years ago.

Should President Mustapha choose a bride from the small Balkan country of 1,000,000 peope lying north of Greece, a link would be formed reaching back into Balkan history. For nearly 500 years the Turks ruled in Albania. Albania became an independent state under Prince William of Wied, then changed to a republic and finally, in 1928, to a kingdom.

King Zog, like Mustapha Kemal, an adherent of the Moslem faith, has had one of the most adventurous careers of any monarch. That career, on which he embarked at the age of seventeen, carried him onward to the throne as first King of Albania before he was thirty-five. He was educated in Constantinople.

Sisters Not Princesses

The four sisters of King Zog do not carry the title of full princesses. When the country changed from a republic to a monarch, it was necessary to change the constitution in several respects. Upon Zog's mother was bestowed the title of dowager queen, while one of the sisters was proclaimed a full princess and his brother was made a prince. It was provided that these were to be the only title gaining full recognition in Albania.

Kemal's divorce in 1925 was one of the sensations of the day. No reasons were given officially for it, but public rumor had been busy for some time concerning the domestic relations of the President. In some quarters the divorce was attributed to a tendency to masterfulness on the part of Mme. Latife and her desire to mix in matters which her husband considered outside her sphere.

French Hesitant On Reform Plans

Praise Doumergue Proposals, But Reluctant To Widen Premier's Powers

Premier Gaston Doumergue's proposals to strengthen the French administration and limit the freedom of the legislative assembly and civil servants are much applauded in today's press, but with many reservations, according to Mr. P. J. Philip's cable to the New York Times on September 25. His article follows:

Almost all comment contains some expression of that traditional reluctance of the French mind to entrust any single person with constitutional authority. Even those who are constantly clamoring for personal authority and are entirely sympathetic toward M. Doumergue's efforts to find a solution for the present situation are hesitant about endorsing fully his plan for giving wide power to the Premiership. They want to be sure first who the Premier will be.

The only real agreement is that something must be done and even that is not unanimous. Extreme Left newspapers and politicians are already busy accusing the Premier of being the enemy of democratic institutions and of the heritage of the revolution. It is evident a long and bitter argument has started.

The strength of M. Doumergue's position is that no party that is a member of the truce majority dares just now to break away. Between the Radical Socialists and the Socialists the situation has become very strained, as was evidenced yesterday when Edouard Herriot, who is Mayor of Lyon as well as Minister of State in the Doumergue Cabinet, and the Socialists in the municipal council of Lyon came to an open rupture. At the same time last Sunday's elections in various districts showed that the Radical Socialists and the Socialist votes can still be switched from one candidate to another to defeat the Right.

What is being sought by M. Herriot and others is the creation of a real Center party and M. Doumergue is also striving toward that end. But it is doubtful whether the Radical element in the country will continue to follow M. Herriot. Everything points to an intense effort by every party to be ready to take control of the situation if and when M. Doumergue's proposed constitutional reforms are put into effect.

It is to be noted, however, that even those who are loudest in praise of the Premier's courage in announcing his program seem to have little faith in its efficacy, because no party in France is willing to concede to any other anything like a four years' period power, and none of them is disposed to put its trust in one man for that period.

How heated political feeling is even during this period of supposed truce was shown last night at Marseilles when billposters of rival political camps fought out their differences with pistols. Two persons were killed and four wounded. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the general belief in the country is not that authority will be restored through constitutional amendments but that ultimately—and it is forecast within two years—power will be in the hands of those who have the courage to seize it.

Fears Budget Deficit

Discussing the government budget bill for 1935 presented by Finance Minister Louis Germain-Martin, who foresaw a surplus of $3,000,000 francs, Deputy Jacquier, as rapporteur, told the Finance Committee of the Chamber today there was every prospect that the budget would actually result in a deficit.

The only hope of insuring a real balance, he said, lies in measures that could foster economic recovery.

M. Jacquier did not contest the government estimates, which he accepted as sincere, but he expressed the opinion that the government was over-optimistic with regard to receipts.

Even the full powers granted to M. Doumergue to make economies by decree did not in practice prevent the 1934 budget from falling into a deficit, he said. M. Jacquier declared the deficit for 1934 would exceed 3,000,000,000 francs. The decrees effected important economies, otherwise the deficit would have been 6,400,000,000 francs, he added.

Reviewing recent fiscal history, M. Jacquier said the 1930 budget had had a slight surplus, the 1931 budget a 5,600,000,000 deficit, the 1932 budget a 6,000,000,000 deficit and the 1933 budget a 6,000,000,000 deficit.

The productivity of labor has also greatly increased, there being a 10 per cent general increase in the number of workers. The heavy industry gross output has increased 30 per cent.

Poland Captures Bennett Cup Race

U.S. Navy Bag Seen Getting Sixth Position, With Buffalo Twelfth

Poland, playing host to the twenty-second annual James Gordon Bennett balloon race, tonight apparently had won the honors in that competition, says a Press report appearing in a New York paper on September 26. The story follows:

Official results will be delayed several days, it was announced, pending the arrival of the balloonists' landing books, certified in each case by authorities in the places where they descended. The Polish Georgraphical Institute then will determine the actual length of each flight.

It was believed that the Polish Warszawa, manned by Z. Burzynski and J. Zakrzewski, which landed near Riazan, Russia, was the winner, having covered approximately 750 miles.

The Kosciuszko, piloted by Captain Franciszek Hynek, which landed near Voronezh, Russia, was believed to have taken second place.

The third Polish balloon, the Polonja, burst and fell into a lake some 200 miles north of Helsingfors, Finland. Its chances for third place were believed to be good.

Despite fears expressed in Moscow yesterday that some of the balloons might have floated deep into the wooded, sparsely settled Russian district of Karelia, all sixteen of the entries that soared away from Warsaw Sunday had been reported tonight.

Pilots and crew of all were safe, although accidents overtook the Polonja and the German Deutschland, the latter having suffered serious damage in its landing near Lono, Russia, the little railroad station where Czar Nicholas's special train stood when he abdicated seventeen years ago.

The unofficial report received here indicated that the Belgian entry Belgique, which landed near Kalinin, Russia, would follow the Polonja closely, with the French Lorraine probably fifth.

Sixth place, it was believed, would fall to the United States Navy balloon, piloted by Lieutenant C. H. Kendall and H. T. Orville, which, latest advices from Moscow said, came down near Smolensk, Russia, approximately 620 miles from Warsaw.

The Buffalo (N. Y.) Courier-Express entry, The Buffalo, was tentatively assigned twelfth place, on the basis of its performance in traveling about 460 miles to land near Leningrad.

It was pointed out, however, that official computations might change slightly the standing of the participants.

Princeton Opens For 188th Year

Traditional Procession Of The Faculty Marks Exercises Attended By 1,800

Exercises to mark the beginning of the 188th academic year of Princeton University were held in the University Chapel here this afternoon, with 1,800 students, faculty members and friends attending. The principal address was by Dr. Harold Willis Dodds, president of the university says a Princeton report to the New York Times on September 25.

The traditional procession of the faculty from Nassau Hall across the campus to the chapel preceded the ceremony. Professor Robert Scoon, chairman of the Department of Philosophy, with Professors Duane Reed Stuart and Allen G. Shenstone as assistant marshals, led the procession. Twenty-one new members of the teaching staff were in the procession.

Ralph W. Downes, choirmaster in the university chapel, played the organ accompaniment for the procession. The service was opened by Dr. Robert R. Wicks, dean of the chapel.

The freshman class of more than 600 students attended the exercises in a group. Dr. Dodds's address was concerned primarily with advice to them.

"The wise man," Dr. Dodds said, "is the one who has developed within himself great faculties by which knowledge is discovered and utilized. They are the critical faculty and the faculty of imagination. Your chief duty at Princeton is to start a healthy development along these two important lines.

"But the critical faculty alone does not drive the world forward. The vitalizing force is the power of imagination. The two are not contradictory but complementary. The man who lacks criticism, whose mind is the creature of impulse, has no strength left to exercise the creative faculty which is what we mean by imagination. His energies have been exhausted in explosion.

"It is your business to strive constantly to find new combinations of ideas in the suggestions which you receive from your teachers and text books."

LAWRENCEVILLE, N. J., Sept. 25—The 125th academic year of the Lawrenceville school started there today with an enrolment of about 500 students. A. R. Hyatt, acting headmaster since the death of Dr. Mather A. Abbott last Spring, would continue in that post. With the opening of the school, it was announced that Dr. Floyd B. Harard, formerly, of the Taft school, would be the head of the classic department here this year.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Never Never Land

Lycurgus, the great Spartan legislator, 9th century, B.C., who was praised as the wisest of men and who was worshipped as a god after his death, enacted a law forbidding all citizens of Sparta to do any kind of labor in their lifetime. He held that labor was unworthy of a Spartan citizen, but rather was the task of the Helots or slaves held in cruel subjection by the Spartans. Since Lycurgus, Spartans enjoyed the most unlimited leisure in all history.

Madame Constantin Youreneff, the wife of the Soviet Ambassador, was hostess Monday at a concert given by the Tokyo Women's Club. The program was given in the ballroom of the Embassy, the grand piano at one end with a background of potted palm trees forming the concert stage.

Mrs. J. D. Hitch Jr., the president of the club, in a short, graceful speech, thanked Madame Youreneff for providing the club with such a beautiful room for their gathering and introduced the chairman of the music department, Mrs. Netke-Lowe who spoke of the three artists who had so kindly consented to appear, Miss Tsuruyo Takeoka, Mrs. Lotte Liebrecht, and Mrs. Ilse Janowski. Two of them, the chairman said, were appearing in Tokyo for the first time, Miss Takeoka and Madame Liebrecht.

In opening the program with a Handel Sonata for violin and piano, Mrs. Liebrecht captivated her audience with her masculine handling of the violin, while Mrs. Janowski interpreted on the piano with a sure touch of sympathy.

Mrs. Janowski in "Faschingsschwank aus Wien" (Carnival in Vienna) by Schuman performed brilliantly, and in the different movements related for her hearers the gaiety, romance and dance of the Austrian capital.

The third number on the first part of the program was a solo by Miss Takeoka who sang the "Agathas Aria" from Weber's "Der Freischuetz." She has a clear, rich soprano with a lyric quality and her voice shows much cultivation.

In the second half of the program Madame Liebrecht again pleased the members of the club with a Mozart Sonata, and Miss Takeoka sang a group of short songs that suited her voice perfectly. She seemed more at home in the two last compositions in Japanese by Yamada which were a pleasure to hear.

After the concert tea was served in the long rooms of the Embassy facing the beautiful Japanese garden. The tea tables were decorated with a profusion of red roses and baskets of fruit.

There was a large gathering of club members, among whom were noticed, Mrs. Davies, Mrs. W. B. Cunningham, Mrs. Bagge, Mrs. Hansen, Mrs. Petzold, Miss Berry, Mrs. Berry, Dr. Read, Mrs. Happer, Mrs. John Reifsnider, Mes Nalser, Mrs. Charles Iglehardt, Mrs. Hanaford, Mrs. Keenleyside, Mrs. Phelps, Mrs. Gerdts, Mrs. W. Lindbergh Identifies Hauptmann By Voice napping case against Hauptmann. Ever since the arrest of the Bronx carpenter three weeks ago investigators have sought to link him to the Sourland Mountain neighborhood where the Lindberghs built their country home.

Their first success in that attempt came last Saturday, when Millard Whited, a logger now living at Lambertville, N. J., said that he had seen Hauptmann emerging from bushes on the Lindbergh estate twice in the two-week period immediately preceding the kidnapping.

Hauptmann has said that he never has been in the neghborhood of the Lindbergh home.

Other Developments Here

The production of the new witness was one of several developments in the New York City phases of the Lindbergh case. Among the others were:

District Attorney Foley announced that he would forge ahead with his preparations to open Hauptmann's trial for extortion on Thursday, despite the murder indictment in New Jersey. Mr. Foley indicated, however, that if the New Jersey authorities started extradition proceedings he would defer to them.

James M. Fawcett, counsel for Hauptmann, announced that his client would take the witness stand to defend himself when he came to trial, whether in the Bronx or in New Jersey.

Judge Harry Stackell of Bronx County Court refused a defense request for permission to examine the minutes of the grand jury that indicted Hauptmann of extortion.

At the court action before judge Stackell, District Attorney Foley indicated that the prosecution had undisclosed evidence which identified Hauptmann as the extortioner without question. "The assumption that there has been no identification is merely hearsay," Mr. Foley told the court.

Murder Indictment

Moving swiftly, a grand jury convened at Flemington, New Jersey on October 8, heard twenty-four witnesses, including Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, and returned a murder indictment against Bruno Richard Hauptmann for the slaying of the Colonel's first-born son Charles Jr.

The indictment, based upon the kidnapping of the Lindbergh baby from the home of his parents on Sourland Mountain in this country on March 1, 1932, surprisingly included no charge of kidnapping.

In his charge to the jurors this morning Supreme Court Justice Thomas W. Trenchard, presiding over the Court of Oyer and Terminer in which the indictment was returned, declared that the prosecution charged that the murder has been committed during a "burglary" of the Lindbergh home by Hauptmann for the purpose of "stealing the infant son in its clothing," but the true bill also did not mention burglary.

Extradition to Be Asked

Attorney General David T. Wilentz and Prosecutor Anthony M. Hauck of Hunterdon County moved rapidly this evening to bring about extradition of Hauptmann so that the German carpenter held in the Bronx might be removed here to stand trial for murder as soon as possible.

The first step was a telephone conversation between Mr. Wilentz and District Attorney Samuel J. Foley of the Bronx who had planned to put Hauptmann on trial there on Thursday for extortion in connection with the kidnapping.

Mr. Wilentz did not know definitely, he said, just when application for extradition would be made to Governor Lehman. It was thought likely here that the papers would be ready by tomorrow morning and that the application would follow closely.

A Legal Consideration

The indictment for murder without a correlative indictment for kidnapping was explained by William Lanigan, assistant prosecutor.

Under the statutes of New Jersey, he said, a killing committed in the course of a "straight law" felony is punishable only by death or life imprisonment. Burglary, arson, robbery and other such crimes are the felonies that fall into this category. Kidnapping does not. It is described merely as a statutory crime.

The forces that will prosecute Hauptmann sought to provide as binding a case in its legalistic phases as possible. Thus, by terming the kidnapping a "burglary," they will be in a position to ask the death penalty regardless of whether the baby was murdered, or died as the result of an accidental blow. If the murder indictment had been predicated upon a charge of kidnapping this would not have been possible in every conceivable defense contingency.

In all, the grand jurors spent four hours and thirty minutes taking testimony. They filled into the court room with a verdict at a few minutes after 4 o'clock this afternoon, and Justice Trenchard instructed Clerk C. Lloyd Fell to ask if they had an indictment.

George N. Robinson, foreman, replied that they did. After he had handed a bundle of papers to Mr. Fell, Mr. Robinson remarked; "We certainly appreciate the cooperation of the Attorney General and the prosecutor in this cae."

"It's very good of you to say so," Justice Trenchard responded.

Justice Trenchard examined a sheaf of papers handed to him by Mr. Fell.

"We observe," he said, "an indictment returned for murder. That indictment will be handed to the clerk and will be retained in the Court of Oyer and Terminer for trial."

Three Women on Jury

The twenty-three grand jurors, including three women, gathered in the old Hunterdon County Court House at about 10 o'clock and, after twenty minutes spent in posing for photographers, filed into the room, where Justice Trenchard charged them. His charge began at 10:20 o'clock and was completed in ten minutes.

The grand jurors, with Prosecutor Hauck and Attorney General Wilentz presenting the evidence, immediately began an examination of witnesses. The first was Dr. Charles H. Mitchell County Physician of Mercer County, who performed the autopsy upon the body of the Lindbergh baby and whose testimony was offered to establish the fact that the child was dead and that the cause of death was "a blow on the head."

Next Albert S. and Albert D. Osborn, handwriting experts, testified that the handwriting on the note left in the baby's nursery was the same as that on other communications from the kidnapper and corresponded to the handwriting of Hauptmann from known samples, such as his automobile driver's license in New York.

Colonel Lindbergh was the next witness. While several hundred persons stood in front of the court house, forming a large oval about the steps and across the broad sidewalk, he drove up, conveyed by three State policemen on motor cycles. Only a driver was in the car with him.

He smiled as Colonel H. Norman Schwazkopf, head of the New Jersey State Police, and Sheriff John H. Curtis of Hunterdon County, stepped forward to meet him. Between them he walked through the crowd, a wide lane having been kept open by the State police on duty, and into the court house. He was hatless and wore a gray suit, blue shirt and tie, and brown shoes.

Colonel Lindbergh went immediately to the grand jury room, where he waited in an anteroom a few minutes until the handwriting testimony was completed. He was before the grand jurors six minutes, testifying that his first son had been stolen on the night of March 1, 1932, identifying the ransom note found in the nursery, and also testifying that he had identified the body found two months and eleven days later not far from the scene of the kidnapping.

He arrived at 11:30 o'clock and departed fifteen minutes later.

British Labor Vote Swamps Radicals

Proposal To Abolish House Of Lords Defeated By Big Margin

A resolution introduced by Mr. Arthur Henderson, president of the World Disarmament Conference, expressing "deep satisfaction" with Russia's entrance into the League of Nations, was unanimously adopted on Oct. 2 at Southport by the British Labor Party, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. Henderson, to the cheers of the assembly, said, "I have noticed a good many criticisms of the step which Russia has taken. I have seen it suggested that the Soviet Government has been influenced by ulterior motives. I do not believe it"

Earlier in the day, the party emphatically turned down a Socialist program which included the abolition of the House of Lords and other drastic steps.

Sponsored by Sir Stafford Cripps, the program was designed for "gingering-up" the advance toward "real Socialism" when the Labor Party next obtains parliamentary power.

The convention defeated it by 2,140,000 to 206,000 on a card vote.

The proposed amendment to the party program would have "socialized" the Bank of England and joint stock banks and would vest the control of land in the Government.

Charges that Japan was making "a deliberate preparation for a war which the Japanese consider essential" were placed before the Party today by Mr. Jack Mills of Dartford, former Member of Parliament.

Mr. Mills demanded that Labor "hammer" from the British Government the declaration that there shall not be, in event of war, any assistance, financial or physical, from Great Britain to help the State which has outlawed itself in the eyes of the civilized world."

The Dartford delegate declared: "Every trade represented here is slowly being battered out of existence by the slave conditions in the Japanese industrial world."

Germany Finds Its League Bolt Costly In Saar

Hitler's advent to power, for the French not unnaturally find it difficult to reconcile his peace protestations with his plea for a war of revenge contained in his auto-biography, "Mein Kampf."

Still more remarkable is the change in attitude of Premier Benito Mussolini of Italy toward the Hitler government. Il Duce used to regard the Nazi leader benevolently as a sort of pupil, but now he fulminates every time he has occasion to mention the Third Reich. He considers that Hitler broke his word given at their Venice meeting not to attempt to impair the independence of Austria.

French Fear Migration

The fate of French sympathizers in the Saar, should the territory vote in January to return to Germany, is worrying the French government.

A mass migration, similar in many respects to that of 1815 when the Saar was returned to Germany after the fall of Napoleon, is one of the possibilities studied. France, with 300,000 unemployed, would be hard put to find places for any great number of refugees.

Already a private committee is canvassing Paris in an effort to solve the problem. This committee has dealt with several hundred cases of Saarites who left the territory, hoping to settle in France.

It is estimated by the French that there are 150,000 descendants of French families in the region of Saarlouis, the most French of all the Saar cities. Most of these, of course, would remain, just as their ancestors did 120 years ago, but many who have fought openly against the Nazis would wish to depart.

Yokohama Seamen's Club, center for seamen while on shore, the scene of a reception yesterday to welcome the new chaplain, Rev. Bernard Briggs.

The at home at the Yokohama Seamen's Club Tuesday afternoon to welcome the new chaplain, the Rev. Bernard W. Briggs, and his mother, Mrs. M. Briggs, was one of the most pleasant affairs of the week in Yokohama.

Mr. E. W. Frazar, the president of the club, introduced the chaplain and Mrs. Briggs to the guests.

The ladies' committee in charge of the tea was composed of Mrs. E. G. Bucknill, Mrs. Louis Jousset, Mrs. H. W. Schenck, Mrs. H. W. Kent, Mrs. B. Bruce and Mrs. O. M. Mccock.

Tea was served at individual tables in the reception room with its hospitable fireplace over which are blue and white tiles designed with a ship at full sail.

Those present during the reception were Governor Sukenari Yokoyama of Kanagawa prefecture who is an honorary patron of the Yokohama Seamen's Club, representative of the Governor of Kanagawa prefecture; Mr. Ryuzo Kaneko, Director of Customs, also an honorary patron, Mr. Katsura, Chief of the Police Section of Kanagawa prefecture and Mrs. Katsura; the American Consul and Mr. Richard Fyfe Boyce, vice-president of the club and Mrs. Boyce; Mr. E. Hamilton Holmes, vice president of the club; Mr. G. S. Phelps, Dr. Gideon Draper, Mrs. C. Helm, Miss Helm, Mr. and Mrs. Covell, Mrs. R. H. Fisher, Miss Daisy Munro, Mr. Clarence Davies, Mrs. G. Cannon, Mr. Atwell, Major Annie Symth, Mr. F. W. Hill, Mr. Atwell and many others.

The Reverend Bernard Briggs who has been installed as chaplain of the Yokohama Seamen's Club has had an active career in the work for sailors. He has served with the North Sea Mission on a steam trawler in rough seas, and in France he was associated with work for sailors at Dunjuerque at a war memorial institution. The new Yokohama chaplain has come to Japan from a Seamen's Club at Poplar, a crowded parish in London's East End, and in consequence brings to his work in Japan a wide and varied experience and knowledge of seafaring men.

His mother, Mrs. M. Briggs is the first hostess the Yokohama Seamen's Club had the good fortune to boast. Like her son she is thoroughly acquainted with seamen ashore.

Knowing the sailor's love of sport while on shore Mr. Briggs is planning a series of football games and other entertainments for the men who make this center their home while in Yokohama.

The attractive reception room with its fire place, comfortable chairs, piano, phonograph and library is the meeting place for men from all parts of the world.

Rev. BERNARD BRIGGS
The new Chaplain of the Yokohama Seamen's Club

The billiard room is well patronized and there is a dining room and barber's shop attached. The bedrooms and dormitory are in frequent use, and at one time during the visit of the British fleet were taxed to the utmost capacity as many as 100 men being given sleeping accommodation.

Mr. Brigg's with his mother have quarters of their own in the building, and the chaplain's study radiates the new influence that will be felt in all the undertakings of the Yokohama Seamen's Club.

Alloys Make Many New Things Possible

Metallurgists have been performing feats of magic by mixing metals and getting alloys that have properties differing from those found in any of the metals as nature provides them. Many thousands of these alloys are available for commercial use and are making possible engineering feats that would otherwise have had to be held in abeyance, says John J. O'Neill in the New York Herald Tribune. There is hardly a field of human activity into which the use of alloys has not penetrated.

Even in the field of sports the metallurgist working over his metal pots in the laboratory has contributed his efforts. He is entitled to his share of credit for the victory in the recent yacht races which kept the cup in America because the Rainbow was supplied with a metal mast of duralumin, an aluminum alloy that provided adequate strength and lighter weight than the wooden mast. Throughout the hull about twenty tons of a chromium-nickel-iron alloy was used. This is similar to the metal used in building lightweight highspeed trains and provides maximum strength with minimum of weight.

A few of the vast number of alloys in general use were shown at the exhibition of the National Metals Congress held at the Port Authority Building in New York recently. Here were shown many demonstrations of the unique properties of the mixed metals, chemical and physical. Here the metallurgists referred to their alloys by mystical sounding formulas such as "18-8-74" instead of by names. The numbers referred to the percentages of the various metals compounded.

"Look how the corrosion-resisting properties change as you go from zero, six and twelve to eighteen," said one metallurgist as he showed four plates dipping in a brine solution. The numbers referred to the percentages of chromium in the metal plates. The zero plate was badly corroded while the "eighteen" had its original high polish.

Japanese Steel

A steel so tough, in its physical properties, that a sheet 0.035 of an inch thick will stop a bullet has been developed by Japanese metallurgists. This is composed of nickel, chromium, molybdenum and iron.

"This starts again the old endless circle of the metallurgists of producing a metal that is so tough nothing can penetrate it and then developing a metal that is so hard and tough that it can penetrate anything," said an expert on nickel alloys.

When the Boulder Dam was planned a call was sent out for valves, big ones, thirty-two feet in diameter, of a metal that under the action of water and its sand content would last as long as the dam itself, as they were to be imbedded in the structure and not easily replaced. A natural alloy of nickel and iron, monel metal, has been used.

The new high-speed streamlined train, the Burlington Zephyr, is built throughout of Allegheny metal, composed of less than one-tenth nickel, less than two-tenths chromium and the remainder iron. With a tensile strength of 90,000 to 100,000 pounds per square inch it is twice as strong as steel and provides equal strengh for half the weight. This metal has also been used for airplane fittings and structural parts.

Two lightweight trains for use on the elevated structures in New York were recently built, one of aluminum and the other of high-strength steel.

All-Metal Homes

A steel metallurgist, addressing a meeting of the Welding Society, stated that suitable alloys were available for construction of all metal homes, and that the newly developed process of rapid spot welding made such construction technically possible. There are some other difficulties still to be met in this field. One manufacturer pointed out that alloys of such high strength have been made that structural units to bear the strains met with in home construction would be so small that they are below the limits of the size that can be made practically in steel mills. Another pointed out that the cost factor is still a problem, as highstrength and corrosion-resistant steels cost about seven times as much as ordinary steels. The latter sell at about 4 cents a pound and the former from 25 to 35 cents.

An alloy, Haynes Stellite, that in some forms costs as much as $6 a pound, works so efficiently as a tool steel when it is red hot, that it is reported to have reduced manufacturing costs of automobiles $10 a car. It also is being used in automobile motors at the spot where the metal receives the hardest usage—at the exhaust valve.

At this point the metal in the motor block was most subject to deterioration. When the valves and seats were faced with stellite bus motors, after 200,000 miles, were found to have their valves in almost perfect condition. Stellite is composed of cobalt, chromium and tungsten.

Carboloy, a carbide of either tungsten, titanium or tantslum, is just a trifle below the diamond in hardness. Its use in automobile manufacturing establishments made possible the use in motor of a very hard allow of luminum, which had very desirable properties, not alone in lightness but in expansion and wear resistance; but it was so hard it was impractical to machine it with ordinary steel tools. The use of a very dense centrifugally cast iron for brake drums was prevented for the same reason until carboloy became available for working it. The substance is now being impregnated with ground up diamonds and is being used for tools for drilling oil wells.

Vanadium-iron alloys increase the resistance of steel to shock and vibration and are used in the springs in the new knee-action machanism in automobiles that gives cars smoother riding qualities.

Silicon-iron alloys have increased the efficiency of electrical transformers, with resulting vast savings to power companies.

The tin cans in which most of our food products are packed have been improved by adding titanium to the iron base metal to which the tin is applied. A better coating of tin results.

A combination of a small amount of silver with a nickel steel alloy has produced a metal with a silverlike appearance that is being used for home and furniture hardware.

The automatic gear shift used recently on the make of car is built throughout of nickel steel. The gears in all cars are made of this wear-resisting alloy.

The steel rails used by railroads are being cleared of defects in the web portions by the use of titanium in making the steel. Titanium is a versatile sort of metal. Its oxide is what makes possible the heavy smoke screens laid down by airplanes in warfare, and it is also the base power used in making cosmetics.

Steels with tungsten added to them have great hardness and toughness at high temperatures and are corrosion-resisting.

Zirconium gives steel resistance to impact and has been used in making bullet-proof steels.

Horseshoe magnets made stronger by the addition of cobalt to the steel, and this electrical property makes the cobalt steels useful for many purposes. It makes better cutting tools.

Aluminum gives steel a hard surface.

One of the earliest of the modern steel alloys was that using manganese with the iron. It resists abrasion as in road scarifying machines, steam shovels, and is used in the chain feeds which supply coal to the box in automatically stocked furances.

Cases for ladies' wrist watches, frames for dirigibles, cables for suspension bridge, needles for hypodermic injections, barrels for transporting beer, are just a few of the many thousands of uses to which the mixed metals produced in the metallurgists' laboratories has been put.

Partnership With Japan

Quite different from Brig.-Gen William Mitchell's plea for 50 dirigibles that could attack Japan in two days was that presented to the Federal Aviation Commission by Col. Eddie Rickenbacker. Colonel Rickenbacker recommended the joint operation of passenger air lines across the Pacific by the United States and Japan to promote friendliness.

The transpacific service should be inaugurated by the United States, he said, and later Japan would join. He also recommended that passenger lines be extended to Hawaii, Philippine Islands and New Zealand.—Ch. Sc. Monitor.

Free State Put To Work Under New Plan

industry, so that all the butter and cheese used in the Free State are made at home, as well as all the bacon. To encourage the consumption of meat and at the same time cover the loss of the British market to the cattle trade, meat is to be retailed to the poor, who have been provided with "vouchers" by the poor relief authorities, at the nominal price of 4d. a pound. The purveyors of meat are compensated from a fund provided by a tax of £1 per head on cattle slaughtered. A canning factory is to be established at Roscrea, in Tipperary, for such cattle as are unsuited to the needs of the beef trade.

Another industry being organized is the tanning of leather from home produced hides. A large public company, associated to some extent with great leather producing concerns in England, has been formed and capitalized and is likely to start manufacturing within a few months.

Clothing Factories Built

In the industries unconnected with agriculture there has been rapid and consistent development for two years, At least four new boot and shoe factories have been opened, and it is probable that the home market can now be adequately supplied from Free State factories. Clothing requirements of the Free State are being met by dozens of new factories. The raw materials for this clothing are also produced at home. A new factory for linen threads is to be started, and imports already have been prohibited, and a cotton thread factory is also to be set going. All the needs in furniture, bedding and upholstery are being supplied from Free State factories.

The main trouble with this policy of rapid industrialization has been with the so-called "heavy" industries, but a start has been made in them with small iron works in Dublin and Cork. It is now possible to obtain steel window frames and numerous other domestic iron and steel needs manufactured at home. Most of the agricultural tools and implements used in the country are being made in many works from Wexford to Sligo, and soon all the aluminum goods will be made in a new factory at Nenagh, in Tipperary. Motor tires will soon be made by a factory in Cork, and imports have already been prohibited. The next move will be to have all the motor vehicles for use in the Free State assembled in home works.

Going Right

The custom of passing to the right was established in the United States by the covered wagon or prairie schooner. Righthandedness being a fundamental human trait, the driver always sat on the right in order to be able to operate the brake with his right hand or foot. This was very important in travelling over hilly country or over ungraded roads.

The Sea Horse

The male of this curious fish is provided with a pouch formed by a fold of skin at the base of the trail. In this receptacle the eggs are deposited and remain there until they are hatched.

German Motors Using Wood Gas

Object Is To Save Imports; 70 To 80 Per Cent Saved On Running Costs

Germany's forests are to play an increasingly important part in replacing raw materials hitherto imported from abroad.

Increased use of wood as motor fuel has just been reported at the Forestry Congress at Bonn, according to the Christian Science Monitor. Today there are more than 100 lorries and autobuses on German roads worked satisfactorily with good gas generators, it was pointed out. This means 70 to 80 per cent reduction of running costs, it is claimed.

Developments along this line have been so great during the past few years that it is now reported that demand is sufficient for wood fuel tanking places to be erected shortly in Saxony and on the Rhine.

The use of wood instead of coal for heating purposes may also increase considerably during the next few years as a result of new propaganda especially among stove-builders, to introduce a new kind of stove which can take either wood or coke fuel.

Experiments in the use of beech wood for cellulose have proved highly satisfactory, it was reported at the Bonn Congress, and the product is so much finer than that obtained from spruce wood that experts had expressed themselves confident that a new substitute for foreign textiles had been found.

Wood was also increasing in importance in general economy, it was declared. Germany has an annual timber trade of 1,000,000,000 marks. Timber is a raw product which experts say, if properly looked after, is inexhaustible. Modern forestry is making possible both quantitative and qualitative increase of Germany's forests, it was declared.

An important discovery announced was that instead of spruce, common pine or Scotch fire could be used for paper-making. This means in practice, it is stated, that half of Germany's total paper production now coming from spruce could be got from common pine which is very plentiful in North Germany. So, the experts declare, the way is open for establishing new paper factories there.

Program at Kabukiza

The most elaborate program for November will be that of the Kabukiza. Utayemon will appear as Kanshojo, the dramatic character taken from the Michizane of history. He will manage to hold his audience in a spell, although he does not move from the cushion on which he kneels.

Kikugoro is to dance in "Yasuna" as the demented husband trying to find his lost wife. This time Kikugoro has something new up his sleeve, and has promised a different and less gay interpretation than is his custom.

The most popular piece on the Kabukiza program however, will be "Kanjincho," the best music-drama of the Kabuki stage, with Koshiro as the warrior-priest.

Shimpa Offerings

The Tokyo Gekijo will be given over to the Shimpa company in November with Kawai, Inouye, and Hanayagi in the leading roles. Miss Ritsuko Mori and her daughter Kakuko will also be seen with this company in plays by Masataro Kawaguchi, Hideo Koide, and Eiichi Seto. The last play, "Friendship of Women" is by a woman writer, Nobuko Yoshiya.

The Toho Gekijo opens on November 2 with an opera, "Song of the Volga Boatman," by Goro Tsudo, and an operetta, "Love Waltz" by Ichiro Kawasaki. A revue called by the strange title, "Jabbu! Jabbu! Konto!" will conclude the elaborate program to be presented by the girls of the Takaradzuka Company.

The Shochiku Girls's Revue begins November 1 at the Shinjuku Daichi Geikijo, and the chief feature of this entertainment is "Paris-Monte Caro." The Azuma Odori, or autumn dances of the Shimbashi geisha, begin this evening at the Shimbashi Embujo. From today, the young Kabuki actors begin an engagement at the Shinjuku Kabukiza with matinees and evening performances. Minosuke and Shoen, Kamezo and Yaozo are in the casts of the plays which are all old Kabuki favorites.

Polish Frowns Could Not Stop Baltic League

Lithuania, Estonia And Latvia Conclude Agreement For Political Union

After 15 years of agitation and effort, the Baltic League has finally come into existence. A remarkable achievement, it is especially notable as it makes for the peace of Europe, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, generally known as the Baltic States, as distinguished from Finland and the Scandinavian group, have concluded an agreement for their political union.

These small countries became independent of Russia in 1919, and their national status was subsequently recognized by the rest of the world. But politically the position of Estonia and Latvia was precarious, because though the Soviet Government had signed peace treaties with them its policy was not friendly. It was so big and they were so little that their joining together for support seemed clearly indicated. It was natural that Lithuania should join them. Thus, there was talk of a Baltic League from the start.

Conferences were held, and at one which took place in Latvia in August, 1920, Mr. S. Meierovicz, then Foreign Minister and later Premier of that State, proposed a close entente of the three countries. At that time a larger scheme for Baltic union covered Poland and Finland, and though in 1922 a pact was signed at a Warsaw conference which embraced these states as well as Estonia and Latvia it failed in the end as Finland refused to ratify.

Poland Said "No"

Poland was the stumblingblock, and not only in the case of Finland, whose action was inspired by doubts of the stability of that State, but also in the case of Lithuania, because of Vilna, which the Poles had occupied in the autumn of 1920. Poland boycoted the Warsaw meeting—and other meetings.

For some years in fact the Vilna question prevented the formation of the Baltic League. Estonia and Lithuania did not accept the Latvian point of view. Yet the League persisted as an ideal among them all. One outcome of the Warsaw conference had been a "political accord" between Estonia and Latvia, and it prepared the way for their Treaty of Defensive Alliance in November, 1923. It was hoped that Lithuania would join up, but ten years were to pass before this hope was realized.

That decennium was marked by a profound change in the political atmosphere of the Eastern Baltic. Till two or three years ago both Estonia and Latvia went in constant fear of the Soviet. The preoccupation of Lithuania was Poland, against whom she turned for support to Russia and Germany, though Memel was a bone of contention with the latter. The great change was very plain in 1932—fear of Germany had replaced fear of the Soviet in Estonia and Lativa and had extended to Lithuania.

Enter Herr Hitler

Under the menace of Japan, the Soviet originated and concluded non-aggression pacts with the three States and other countries, including Poland, thus depriving Lihuania of one of the props of her policy. With the coming to power of Herr Adolf Hitler in 1933 the "recovery," as it was called, by Germany of the Eastern Baltic "lands" was put in the forefront of the expansionist program of the National Socialists, cutting away Lithuania's second prop. The Ten-Years Peace Pact between Poland and Germany completed and emphasized Lithuania's isolation.

Two things which were closely connected resulted. The first was that, in the spring of this year, Lithuania began to orient herself toward Poland, after all her ancient ally, and Marshal Josepa Pilsudski, it was known, was not unsympathetic. It really looked as if some accommodation, if not a positive solution, respecting the Vilna problem was in sight. The second thing was the reopening by Lithuania of the negotiations with Estonia and Latvia for a Baltic League, Vilna no longer being apparently a barrier.

Now, the Baltic League is a fact—it has been formed; the three States are united politically, and will present a common front to the world, but not in any aggressive sense, as it is a purely defensive agreement that finds them together.

Vilna

But there is a qualification, and it relates to Vilna. Both Estonia and Lativia have "disinterested" themselves respecting this question, as they maintain that it must be settled by the Lithuanians and the Poles alone, and does not concern them. The Baltic League, therefore, has shelved the problem. Most unfortunately, no accommodation has taken or is likely to take place at present concerning Vilna between Lithuania and Poland.

Marshal Pilsudski undoubtedly made overtures to Lithuania, and at first these were well received ;there was a likelihood of a genuine detente. However, there has been a big hitch in the negotiations. Something very strange occurred. A well-known French journalist, who is a member of M. Edouard Herriot's party in the French Parliament, visited Kaunas, the Lithuanian capital, and encouraged the Lithuanians to reject Marshal Pilsudski's overtures by stating that France would now replace Germany as their friend against Poland.

Venetian Glass Designs Swing To Modern Lines

Term No Longer Synonymous With Highly Ornamental And Richly Decorated

Made famous for centuries by the skill of the Murano blowers, Venetian glass is swinging into classic and simple lines. Those glasses and vases with stems made of transparent dolphins with curled tail and fancy fins and the other feathery filigree work requiring the greatest of technical ability are giving way to two new departures in this historic material.

The term "Venetian" is no longer synonymous with ware highly ornamental and richly decorated, reports the Christian Science Monitor. Today much of it is stripped of superfluous detail and assumes classic lines. Venetian tableware now is devoid of ornamental stems, and of frail, delicate handles.

The other departure is the discovery of a new medium. Instead of the delicate transparent glass, the Venetian glass blowers are now working in an opaque, plastic material which they mold into art objects. A modern-looking blackbird, a carmine elephant; a modern deer with legs outstretched as in the chase; these are some of the decorative pieces the glass blowers of Venice are making to go into modern interiors.

The new plastic substance is approximately the same material as the opaque pieces used in msoaics. It requires the greatest of technical skill in firing to prevent losing the proper hue. Special furnaces are necessary and must be kept at just the right temperature. If too hot, there is danger of having a lovely green-blue turn into a nondescript gray, for example.

All of this means that a new art which is quite skin to sculpture is developing, for these figurines and decorative objects, though made with the crude tools of the glass blowers, look as though they might have been molded from clay and then given a glossy surface. Furthermore, the paste is capable of many beautiful hues the formulas for which are said to be curtained in dramatic secrecy, which may be more affected than actual. There are practically no secrets nowadays, in these old arts.

The home of the famous Venetian glass is on the island of Murano, a mile north of Venice. There more than half the population make their living by glass blowing, as have whole families, for generations back. Some ten or twelve of these artists came to a Century of Progress this summer under the supervision of Signor Celso Baccovich, manager of the Venice-Murano Company, Italy's royal glass factory.

The black-shirted men, working before a highly heated furnace, demontrated for thousands of Fair visitors how the delicate glass is made. They swung their blow pipes and thurned pendants of molten glass into lovely transparent vases and shapely art objects. Except for the gas-fired furnace which had to be substituted at the Fair for their customary beechwood fire, Signor Baccovich said their technique and general methods were much the same as in their home factory in Murano.

Though dripping with perspiration in front of crucibles heated to 2600 degrees Fahrenheit, the master blower, Mr. Edwino Ferro, moved about with the grace of an opera singer. Stepping back to his bench with a blow pipe in his band he seated himself with poise and ease. Indeed, this glass blowing is really an art and sometimes the men work in slippers to prevent any unnecessary jarring when they have to move about with a delicate glass vase in formation at the end of their blow pipe.

It Looks Very Simple

The men work in crews of three a master with his two apprentices. Their tools might easily be mistaken for those of a blacksmith or some worker in crude iron or steel. Besides the blow pipe, they use big pincers, a large pair of shears and a steel rod.

It does not take long to turn out a vase. An apprentice dips the long blow pipe into the glowing furnace, brings it out with a small mass of molten glass on the end, blows into the pipe for a moment until the mass begins to expand and then hands it to the master. He swings it around like a wand, watches it elongate, slips it back again into the furnace, pulls it out, opens the end, inserts a tool, twists and twirls it until a red vase, flared at the top, begins to take form and shape.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Won Three Games In 2-2/3 Innings

Denny Burns was signed up on the team of the Birmingham Barons in 1932 for the express purpose of relieving starting pitchers in distress, and during his first few days showed some startling results. In his first game on May 12th, he faced only two Memphis batters and received credit for the 7-6 victory. Two days later Burns pitched only innings in a double header against Little Rock and received credit for both victories, when only nine batters faced him in the two games. He therefore won three games in only 3-2/3 innings, although he allowed one run and three hits.

The Corn Husking Champ

Of great social and economic importance are the corn husking bees around the corn belt of the Middle Western part of the United States during the harvesting season, when individuals, families, and sometimes even the villages join hands in competitive efforts to store away the crop. Various records have been established and applauded, but none seems more remarkable than that of David J. Cook of Remsen, Iowa, who estimates that during his lifetime he has husked more than 130,000 bushels. In 1919 Cook performed the almost-impossible when he husked 92 bushels in 3 hours, and since that feat has been known as "Husky Cook the Husker."

importance not only to Yokohama but also to Japan as a whole.

Confidence Re-established

"Now practically speaking, Yokohama is reconstructed, enlarged and embellished. Its activity, trade and importance have regained for our city the third place among the ports of Japan and confidence in the future of Yokohama is re-established, a confidence not only shared by all Yokohama-ites but also by all the various Ministries of the Government, whom we have the honor to find represented here to-day, to greet and to thank for the erection of this magnificent, up-to-date building, not only well in keeping with the other beautiful structures that re-adorn our much afflicted city, but which embodies all the latest innovations that contribute towards an efficient postal and telegraph service.

"On behalf of the members of the Yokohama and Tokyo Foreign Board of trade, I express the hope that by a wise and far-sighted administration, from it will be contributed its anticipated share towards the promotion of mutual understanding and confidence between the Empire of Japan and all the other Powers, as desired by H. M. the Emperor of Japan in the Imperial Rescript of last year."

Soviet Council Adds 10,000,000 To Voters' List

Takes In Children And Youths Who Work For Soviet Union

Ninety million Russian voters, 10,000,000 more than there were three years ago, will participate in soviet general elections to be held starting Nov. 10 to elect delegates to the seventh all-union soviet congress, says a Moscow dispatch to the Chicago Daily Tribune.

The 10,000,000 new voters are mostly children and youths, sons and daughters of kulaks, who are doing useful work for the soviet union. The central executive committee issued regulations today giving them the right to vote.

The youngsters have been trained by communist and labor organizations. The bars have been let down also for many kulaks (individual farmers) and their families, those who have demonstrated by hard work their loyalty to the soviet union.

Lets in Many Kulaks

Kulaks in exile for anti-soviet activity who have been working faithfully in their new homes are to be given back the ballot after five years' exile, or after three years if they are engaged in the gold or platinum industries.

Young Kulaks who have become shock brigaders in Russia industries under the second five-year plan are to be given the ballot regardless of the length of their exile.

All dependent relatives of exiled kulaks have been disfranchised under stringent soviet constitutional restrictions, and today's order provided the vote will be restored to them automatically when the franchise bar is lifted against the head of the family.

The regulations provide that no election will be valid in which 50 per cent of the qualified electors fail to cast votes.

Divide Election Period

The general elections are to be held between Nov. 10 and Jan. 10. the congress opening Jan. 15. Nine hundred and eighty-six delegates are to be chosen for the all-union congress, which is the supreme authority under the soviet constitution.

Rural soviets will elect their members between Nov. 10 and Dec. 23. Those living in metropolitan centers will vote from Nov. 20 to Dec. 10. These local soviets elect delegates to the district soviets, which in turn elect representatives to provincial soviets.

Delegates to the provincial congresses are elected in the same manner, and provincial congresses elect delegates to the all-union congress. The designation of these all-union delegates will take place between Dec 30 and Jan. 10.

Morgan Library Put On Tax List

New York City Assessors Add $1,656,000 To Valuation; Total Is $55,640,000

The Morgan Library, housing the art treasures of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, was added to the list of hitherto tax exempt properties which the city has restored to the 1935 tax rolls. Its valuation will add $1,665,900 to the total of $55,640,900 from such holdings previously announced by the board of taxes and assessments.

Omission of the library from the original list came to the attention of Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia on Oct. 7 when he demanded of the tax board why it had not been included, according to the Christian Science Monitor. As a result, the board met in special session and voted unanimously to withdraw the library's tax-free privilege.

Like many other tax-exempt properties here, the Morgan Library operates under an individual act of exemption. The Mayor said he would ask for legislation repealing many such acts, but that reforms would depend upon support by taxpayers, trade associations and the press "against the pressure that will be brought on behalf of those who have enjoyed tax exemptions."

"Some people have thought that all property owned by churches was exempt, but this is not so," he said. Many pieces of exempt property had been leased out. If a given piece of property is used for commercial purposes, the test is not "what becomes of the profit," but "does it compete with taxpaying property?"

"This tax exemption proposition is one that real estate owners have been clamoring about for 20 years. Now in nine months, we have gotten at least $55,000,000 worth of this tax-exempt property listed. Naturally everyone is entitled to a hearing."

The Morgan Library was turned over to six trustees in 1924 by Mr. Morgan the elder, who valued the building and its art collections at $85,500,000. It was to be administered as a public reference library, under a special act of incorporation. Admission could only be obtained by written application, however, its use being limited "to such persons as are duly accredited."

Maltese Courts To Use Native Language Soon

Move To Italianize British Island Colony Checked By New Measure

Maltese for the Maltese!

After a 50-year-old language controversy, Maltese comes into its own at last by supplanting Italian as the official language of the law courts in "John Bull's Peephole in the Mediterranean," as this British Crown Colony has sometimes been described, reports the Christian Science Monitor.

The Imperial Government's decision, in the form of a proclamation issued by the Governor of Malta, General Sir David Campbell, has just come into force. English remains the administrative language of the island.

It is understood that the British decision to supplant Italian by Maltese results from an investigation into legal procedure recently carried out in Malta by Sir Alison Russell, who was appointed legal adviser to the Governor for the purpose. This investigation apparently disclosed serious abuses which "in the interest of justice call for immediate action."

Mainly, the delays are due to proceedings in Italian, "which in most cases the litigants are unable to follow."

Based on Majority Preference

Since not more than one in ten Maltese knows Italian, while four out of five speak only their mother tongue, the British decision is based "on the elementary principle that cases should be conducted in the language understood by the parties concerned."

Henceforth litigants who do not speak Maltese may conduct the proceedings in English. Italian-speaking litigants, however, may, where necessary, conduct "oral" proceedings in Italian.

The Government's decision is considered here as an act of simple justice to the Maltese. It is, however understood to have a political significance as well. Some, for instance, see it as a blow against the "Italianizing" policy of the Maltese Nationalist Party, whose known preference for Italian instead of their own language led to the suspension, some 10 months ago, of the Maltese Constitution, mainly because the Mifsud Ministry, by establishing special classes in Italian, broke its bargain with Britain whereby only Maltese and English were to be taught in the elementary schools.

Restricted Use of Italian

According to the Royal Commission of 1931 which made a thorough investigation into the language and other questions, Italian in Malta is used by a "small educated class," particularly by the legal and madical professions and the Roman Catholic Crurch. Maltese on the other hand, which is somowhat akin to Arabic, is the language " of most of the sermons, in the shops, markets, streets, and public meetings, on election platforms, and in a growing vernacular press."

Since Italian has its chief footing in the law courts, legal opinion is strongly opposed to the Imperial Government's latest "reform by decree." The lawyers contend that Maltese is deficient in legal terminology, but this difficulty, it is believed here, can easily be overcome by using English whenever necessary. It is also anticipated that during the transition from Italian to Maltese a sufficient number of non-Maltese terms and phrases can be introduced into the language.

Meanwhile, Maltese hope that this firm stand by the Imperial Government on behalf of the Maltese mother tongue may prove to be a first step toward the eventual restoration of that constitutional government of which the island was deprived by the language issue at the end of last year.

Hawaii Recovering

HONOLULU—Hawaii's economic recovery is reflected in the fact that during the last six months Federal Emergency Relief Administration rolls have dropped from a total of 6500 to 3700. Large number of workers have been absorbed into the pineapple industry, which is enjoying a good comeback.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT" ----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

A Figure Of Speech

610 consists of Six, One, Zero, the Italian for which is Sei, Uno, Zeno. In a connected sentence these three words mean "You are a Nought". A few years ago the Italian authorities had to bar the mails to letters addressed to a very prominent Italian, bearing the figure "610".

The Bloodless Leader

In the Middle Ages when the "condottieri" led professional armies to battle, the clash was usually more a game of skill than bloody encounter. The heavy-armored knight was generally invulnerable, and it was usual to achieve "great feats of arms" without shedding a drop of blood. Soldiers would change sides as soon as their enlistment was up, war prisoners would be mutually released on the principle that one good turn deserves another.

Some of these "bloody battles" in which not a single soldier was killed were: the great baittle of Macolo in which "the pride of Venice's enemy was humbled", the battle of Anghieri in which "Milan was crushed", the battle of Macholdio, the battle of Soncini and others. The leader of these battles on the Venetian side was the Count of Carmagnola (1390-1432) who from a swineherd rose to be one of the greatest Italian generals. His particular distinction was that he led in 40 battles in which not a drop of blood was spilled.

Nationalization of Mining In Brazil

Progressive Steps Toward Goal Foreshadowed As It Enforces New Code

Brazil's new mining code foreshadows progressive nationalization of mines and mineral deposits considered basic or essential to the economic or military defense of the nation.

Offers of assistance is coupled with strong control, and the attitude of the mining companies remains to be seen, says the New York Herald Tribune. With the return to constintutional government, the administration drew up the code to encourage prospecting, specifying that such prospecting could start only by concession of the government, granted only to Brazilians and to companies organized in Brazil.

Distinction between surface and subsoil ownership is the keynote of the new law. Unknown deposits, when discovered, will be incorporatde into the national patrimony as an inallienable title.

Companies Become Guardians

Observers believe companies holding land in the interior open unknown deposits virtually lose their ownership rights, becoming guardians of wealth belonging to the government. Owners of surface rights cannot prevent exploitation of minerals on their land, and cannot claim indemnity for prospecting by a third party. When deposits are actually being worked, however, the surface owner is entitled to a percentage of the profits.

Mines worked when the code became effective are not compelled to obtain concessions from the government, but they must comply with other provisions of the code and must revise their contracts accordingly before they can claim benefits.

For there are benefits, such as exemption from duty on machines and apparatus when such equipment is not produced in Braizil, and minimum rate on railroads for port and dock services. The law also stipulates that mining companes cannot be taxed by states or municipalities beyond a certain percentage of their income, determined by the federal government.

Prospectors to Get Permits

According to the new system, any one, on making proper representations to its government, may obtain permission to prospect of mineral deposits. The results of such prospecting must be submitted to the government for determination whether they should be worked.

If the government is ready to grant a concession for exploitation, the owner of the surface soil must bid for it, but his bid must be equal to that made by the prospector or any third party. He is assured a small percentage of the mine income in case he does not take over the concession. The prospector is similarly protected in the event the surface owner or a third party outbids him.

"Happiness," declaimed the philosopher, "is the pursuit of something, not the catching of it."

"Have you ever," interrupted the plain citizen, "chased the last car on a rainy night?"

Miss Halohan had a splendid opportunity to observe the work of the prison. She said through an extension course, the men were obtaining the equivalent of a university education and they were studying subjects ranging from mathematics and navigation to a shipbuilding and journalism. They held debates with university teams whom they frequently defeated. Before she left home, the prisoners gave her a "Red Cross book" which they made themselves. It contained a painting of the ship on which she sailed which they had produced with only a postcard picture of the ship as a guide, a flower painting, and a poem which one of the prisoners wrote.

French Deputy 'Pinks' Lawyer

Third Affair Resulting From Stavisky Case, Sheds Blood

Blood was drawn on September 30 in a French political duel for the first time since the late Serge (Handsome Alex) Stavisky restored the ancient institution to its former place in French public life, according to a dispatch to the Chicago Daily Tribune by Edmond Taylor. In two previous duels no blood was shed.

The combatants were Guy la Chambre, undersecretary in the Daladier cabinet, and Jacques Renouvin, prominent Paris lawyer, who the other day called La Chambre an "assassin" and slapped his face.

The duel took place early in the morning at Saint Servan race course near here, and rapiers were used instead of the more usual small caliber target pistols. A solemn contract had been drawn up by the two sets of seconds stipulating that the combat would go on until one of the combatants was wounded, but would then cease.

Sterilize the Blades

The little party of duelists, seconds, referee, and doctors assembled on the race track and went through the time honored ritual of the duel, culminating in passing the blades of the rapiers through alcohol and flame to sterilize them, and then placing the adversaries point to point and giving the signal.

Within 25 seconds Renouvin had received a scratch from the enemy's sword point in the right biceps, and the combat halted according to contract.

The duelists stalked off the field without the customary reconciliation.

La Chambre is the third deputy to be involved in a duel since the Stavisky scandal, and the second cabinet minister. The former minister of communication, Jean Mistler, exchanged shots with a royalist insulter under the walls of Carcassonne last spring.

Blame on Police Gun Fire

The three duels and several challenges all are due to accusations of being mixed up in the Stavisky scandal or being an assassin for having belonged to the Daladier cabinet, which is held responsible for the bloody February riots in which twenty-five anti-Stavisky rioters were killed by police gun fire, the latter being the cause of today's affray.

September 30's affair lacked the ceremony of the previous encounters, La Chambre and Renouvin being dressed in street clothes and caps. La Chambre wore a blue shirt, and his whole attitude was matter of fact and perfunctory.

One of La Chambre's seconds was Gen. Barthelemy, president of the Saint-Malo Officers' Reserve association. That organization demanded Barthelemy's resignation because of his association in the duel.

Australian E. Mission's Work In Japan Told

Australian policy were traceable to misstatements made in Australia.

Power of Press

The publication of untrue and inaccurate matter does a good deal of harm to Australian trade and other interests and it is, in my opinion, important that an official representative should be appointed to Japan. The press in Japan is a powerful influence in the community and plays a big part in forming public opinion. As previously mentioned a number of countries are endeavoring to exclude Japanese goods and the Japanese press is paying a good deal of attention to this question and is urging action.

Trade Agreement.—It was made clear to us on many occasions that Japan desires to negotiate a trade treaty with Australia. I said that I would ask our Government to treat the matter with as great expedition as possible as soon as we had received certain necessary information for which we had asked the Japanese authorities.

Conclusion.—I found that, when the position was frankly put, representatives of Japanese interests accepted the principle that Australia was as entitled to protect and promote Australian interests as Japan to protect and promote Japanese interests. I was careful to point out, on many occasions, that interests of Australia were closely bound up with those of the British Empire. I found that in order to make the point clear, I sometimes had to explain at some length the actual position of the Commonwealth as a self governing part of the Empire.

I conclude this section of this Report, relating to Japan, by quoting the following message which I received during the homeward voyage from the Minister for Foreign Affairs in Japan:—

"I wish to convey my gratefulness to you for having afforded me the opportunity of holding interesting discussions on various questions of importance affecting our relations which were highly conducive to mutual benefit.

Allow me to tender my heartfelt congratulations on the great success of the Australian Mission, whose visit to our shores will powerfully contribute to foster and further promote our friendship."

Phillipine Islands

The Mission visited Manila and Davao on 28th May and 31st May respectively, in the course of the homeward voyage.

At Manila official calls were made and His Britannic Majesty's Consul-General (Mr. T. J. Harrington) who had met the ship, afterwards entertained the whole Mission at a dinner party where we met prominent residents.

At Davao, a place in which there are only 25 Europeans, six alone of them being British, I was greeted by the Provincial Governor (Mr. Juan A. Sarenas), His Britannic Majesty's Vice-Consul (My W. C. Naismith) and various local officials and subsequently entertained with my staff at a supper party tendered by the local Chamber of Commerce under the Presidency of Mr. E. A. Cogan.

It was a unique function in that it was the only known occasion within the memory of those present on which so many people had come together at one time, Europeans, Filipinos and Japanese.

It appears that owing to the passing of what is known as the United States Flag Act, Australian export trade to the Philippine Islands will rapidly diminish, particularly in meats, butter and possibly flour. This Act apparently provides that where United States producers can supply any particular commodity any Philippine Island Army contract for the supply of such goods must be given to United States suppliers, irrespective of whether foreign suppliers quote lower prices. In the case of a recent contract for the supply of beef the American contract which was accepted was at a figure 50 per cent. greater than the price submitted by the Australian tenderer.

The principal Australian exports to Philippine Islands during the last three financial years are as follow:—

	1930-31	1931-32	1932-33
Butter	61,000	50,000	47,000
Bacon and hams	12,000	12,000	15,000
Frozen beef ...	113,000	47,000	71,000
Other meats ..	14,000	15,000	13,000
Condensed milk	9,000	16,000	123,000
Flour	77,000	95,000	92,000
Coal	30,000	66,000	54,000

The Mission was also informed that Nestles this year are supplying condensed milk from the United States and not from Australia as was the case in 1932-33.

The whole question is one which might form the subject of negotiation with the United States of America Consul-General in Sydney, preferably when tariff questions between United States of America and Australia are being discussed.

The approaching independence of the Philippines will almost inevitably involve some changes in the existing trade channels. I was informed that Spanish merchants were already preparing plans for the recovery of trade. It would be wise for the Trade Departments of the Commonwealth to take special steps to watch developments and possible openings in the Philippine Islands.

On 2nd June we reached Menado (Celebes) where I was met on board by the Dutch Resident (Dr. F. Visman), the Assistant Resident (Mr. J. Oberman) and others and shown every possible courtesy.

We sailed again on the same day and so concluded the series of visits throughout the Far East which it had been the very responsible task of the Mission to undertake.

Conclusion

Throughout our journey the Mission was very greatly assisted by the representatives of Great Britain, both in British possessions and in foreign countries. I am glad to take this opportunity of expressing my sincere thanks for the great help so readily and generously given.

On many occasions I found it desirable to draw particular attention to the position of Australia as a self-governing member of the British Empire. I am glad to have justification for my belief that the work of the Mission was of value not only to Australia, but also to the British Empire as a whole.

On 14th June, 1934, the Right Honorable Sir John Simon, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was asked in the House of Commons whether he was prepared to make any statement with respect to the work of the Mission. The Secretary of State, necessarily basing his reply upon reports sent to him by British representatives in the East, answered the question as follows:—

"I understand that a report of the results of the tour will be presented by Mr. Latham to the Commonwealth Government. In the meantime the British Government had been kept fully informed of the progress of Mr. Latham's Mission. I feel sure that the House will join me in congratulating Mr. Latham on the success of his journey, which has been of the greatest value to Australia and the British Commonwealth of Nations in promoting good relations with the countries of the Far East."

This reply constitutes very real testimony to the value of the work of the Mission.

It was not the function or object of the Mission to arrange agreements with other peoples. The visit of the Mission was a visit of courtesy. The expectation that such a visit would be appreciated has been abundantly justified. Many questions will arise in the future between Australia and the countries of the East. The visit of the Mission has created a friendly interest in Australia and a friendly attitude towards Australia in all the countries which were visited. This atmosphere should greatly assist in the solution of present and future problems.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Swastika

The swastika is either male or female depending upon whether it is left or right winged. The German Nazis use the female swastika. While the Germans always employed the swastika as the symbol of anti-semitism, it is a curious fact that the Arabs, the most semitic of all people, have long used the same symbol on their tombstones as the sign of death. The German traveller, Jujius Euting, professor of the University of Strasburg, found the swastika in my drawing on ancient Arabian tombstones in the province of Hajel, Central Arabia in 1883. The Nazi Swastika is a derivative of the Arabic.

Alaska

Alaska extends from 51 degrees latitude north (in the Aleutians) to 72 degrees north (at Point Barrow). This corresponds to the distance between Canada and Mexico. In longitude Alaska extends from 130 degrees west at Portland Canal to 173 degrees east, at Attu Island. This exceeds the geographical distance between New York on the Atlantic and Eureka on the Pacific. Alaska's area of 590,000 square miles is 1-3 greater in size than the Atlantic States from Maine to Florida.

Jean Piccard Makes Stratosphere Flight

Wife Describes Flight As Complete Success

Rengo

DETROIT, Oct. 23—The attempted ascent into the stratosphere by Dr. Jean Piccard and his wife was described by her as a complete success soon after their 175-feet high balloon landed today at an isolated spot near Cadiz, Michigan.

Dr. Piccard and his wife, who will be known as the first woman to fly into the stratosphere, threw their instruments overboard so that they might not be irreparably damaged if a fire were to break out and descended themselves by means of parachutes.

Dr. Piccard, a brother of the famous Belgian scientist, August Piccard, who was the first man to reach the stratosphere, said that they had travelled a distance of 125 miles, but in the absence of wireless contact with the ground they were ignorant of their whereabouts.

The flight marks the climax of preparations started more than a year ago. The Piccards originally intended to make their ascent in July or August, but their preparations were not completed until this month.

While Mrs. Piccard sat in the pilot seat of the big gondola operating the controls, her husband was deep in the study of scientific data. The couple emphasize that their purpose was not to break any altitude record, but merely to study conditions in the stratosphere.

Mrs. Piccard qualified last summer for the first balloonist's licence ever granted a woman and although she and her husband have had very little aerial experience, they both have a thorough theoretical knowledge of aeronautics.

One of the main reasons why they undertook the adventure was because Dr. Piccard was unemployed and desired to avoid wasting time until he secured another engagement as an instructor in science.

Missionary Seen As Gas Salesman

Mrs. Kendall, Writer, Named; Dealer Here Had Enough Guns For An Army

Nearing the end of the first phase of its inquiry into the operations of the American munitions industry, the Senate investigating committee produced additional evidence of the world-wide scope of the American "gas" business, according to a Washington dispatch to the New York Times on September 20. The story is full follows:

It disclosed that the two principal chemical or "gas" companies in this country were also to a very large extent in the business of making or selling other military weapons, principally machine guns of the Thompson type.

The evidence, all from the files of the corporations concerned, showed that the United States Ordnance Engineers, Inc., export agency of the Lake Erie Chemical Company of Cleveland, had played a leading role in equipping the Nanking Government of China to wage "poison gas" warfare, and that the building of a big "military gas" plant for Colombia was under negotiation between the company and that country's government.

Colonel E. C. Goss, who was the chief of the chemical service of the Second Army of the American Expeditionary Force in France, is president of the Lake Erie company and also of United States Ordnance Engineers, Inc. He was the principal witness this afternoon.

Missionary as "Salesman."

Before Colonel Goss was called the committee concluded the examination of J. W. Young, president of Federal Laboratories, Inc., of Pittsburgh, and Frank Jonas of New York, Latin-America representative of that concern.

As previously the inquiry was mainly into the activities of Federal Laboratories in South and Central America and involved among other things activities of the Rev. Young and a missionary of the Christian Missionary Alliance in the Ecuadorian field.

The missionary was disclosed in letters he wrote to his brother to have acted at times as a "tear gas demonstrator" for Federal Laboratories.

"It would appear," remarked Senator Bone, "that Paul's activities give a new meaning to the familiar old tune, 'Onward, Christian Soldier.'"

He described the missionary as having a "tambourine in one hand and a gas bomb in the other."

From the files of Mr. Jonas the committee read into the record that J. Figueroa of New York had on hand in 1932 enough arms and ammunition, including complete batteries of field and mountain artillery, machine guns and rifles, to equip an army.

Subsequently it was developed that Mr. Figueroa had filled an order for 1,000,000 rounds of rifle ammunition for a South American country, the order being placed, according to Mr. Jones, at the request of W. T. Brown of Pyington and Co., New York. A little later Mr. Figueroa, at Mr. Brown's request, bought a boat which arrived shortly in Brazil, Mr. Jonas said.

Deal Sought With Japan

Mr. Young said he had sought to reach an agreement with Japan for the sale of "tear gas" patents to that country, but that no contract had been signed.

Colonel Goss was then called to the witness chair.

A document in evidence stated that so far as "tear gas and tear gas equipment is concerned" the Lake Erie Chemical Company had the New York Police Department in the "hollow of its hand."

"That is not true and I wish it was," said Colonel Gross. He added that it was Captain Hans Tauscher's concern and not this company which received the 1934 "tear gas" order of the New York department. Captain Tauscher was mentioned at a previous hearing.

Colonel Goss said it was true his company sold gas for use in controlling disorder, and this included strikes. He argued this was "the real humane way of handling such disturbances."

When Senator Clark charged that tear gas used in the bonus riots in Washington in 1932 was responsible for the death of two babies, Colonel Goss challenged the statement.

Work In Crime Prevention Has Effect In Europe

Proper Training Of Youth Has Given Good Results, Says Geneva Report

Benefits from crime prevention work are beginning to shine out in Europe against the somber background of prison punishment, says a report from Geneva to the Christian Science Monitor.

Schemes for training youth in citizenship and organizing leisure are being widely adopted as means of attracting juveniles away from sources of crime. This is particularly noticeable in countries under dictatorial regimes. Even though political motifs often appear to be underlying factors in this policy, investigations show that states are recognizing the advantages of spending money in preventing the cause of crime rather than in having to deal with crime and criminals after they have become hard and fixed elements in society.

There is also the negative as well as the positive side of this training. The negative part finds expression largely in various forms of censorship. No matter how undesirable dictatorial control of the press may be considered, the benefits of the "clean up" of newspapers which has been effected in several European countries can hardly be ignored.

The great importance which Germany places upon prevention of crime among youth is indicated by the strong and widespread organization which has been built up during the past decade. Whatever their differences in matters of politics, both the previous governments and the National Socialists have given practical support to all movements destined to improve the conditions from which crime among youth has generally sprung.

In the "Jugendamt" (Youth Commission, or Juvenile Board) and its rather less official "Jugend Fursorge" (Youth Welfare Work), Germany has two institutions which cover the whole country, catering for the moral, intellectual and physical needs of all up to 18 years of age.

The tasks with which these organizations are faced include both the setting right again of children who have become abnormal in their relations to society, due to bad home or other influences, and the continuous development along sound lines of the social relations of the so-called normal children, especially in early youth.

Youth Welfare Officer

An important part in the first task is played by the youth welfare officer. He has charge of a special area, a block of house or a street, in a city, for example, and is fully acquainted with the home and school life of every child in that area. He works in close cooperation with the school-teacher and with the youth commission, and his primary task is to act as adviser to the family.

Where it is a case of the child being saved from the evil influences of its own family, the state interferes and the child comes under its supervision, generally being placed in a reliable family at the public expense. It is said that at the present time, there are 60,000 such children in Germany, the half of which are in Prussia.

Other ways in which Germany now endeavors to safeguard its growing youngsters include that of preventing them seeing any films but those specially passed as fit for them. Furthermore it is contrary to the law for those under 16 to take alcohol, and spirits are forbidden all those under 18 years old, and it is hoped to raise this age to 20 shortly.

Measures to prevent youth from frequenting drinking houses are taken in most European countries. In Bulgaria no pupils are allowed to go on the streets late at night, nor can they attend public meetings not approved by the school authorities.

Training of youth for citizenship has become one of the major problems of the state in central and southeast Europe. All manner of ways are being sought to keep young folk away from bad influences.

In Austria, there is an extensive organization known as the "Friends of the Children," which has maintained scores of active centers devoted to the amusing, training, feeding and encouraging of children. Besides this is an organization of "Nature Friends" with more than 200 huts in the Austrian mountains, which winter and summer has aided scores of thousands of youth in taking mountain outings.

Checked by Dictatorship

This type of activity started by the Socialists has received something of a check under the dictatorship, but it is hoped it is only temporary.

In Yugoslavia, there is a very large official youth movement carried on by the state through the Sokol organization. This has penetrated into every town and many villages. Its aim is to inspire youth to work for the common good rather than for selfish interests.

In Hungary, a similar semi-official youths' organization exists.

In Bulgaria, a large institution has just been created by the state for "social renewal" of youth.

"Organize the child's spare time" and "keep the child off the streets" are the basic principles underlying Soviet Russia's elaborate crime prevention program for which educational authorities claim striking results. In Moscow, where the campaign against juvenile delinquency is most advanced, educators declare crime among children from 10 to 16 years old has been reduced in five years by one-half. Experiments in Moscow are intended to work out a system which eventually can be extended throughout Russia.

Soviet educators are convinced that much juvenile delinquency can be avoided by keeping children and young people usefully busy. The Soviet state undertakes to organize the leisure of its children even more thoroughly than is adults. In the schools, there is much emphasis upon such extracurricular activities as theaters, orchestras, bands, choirs, dancing classes and literary circles.

Moscow has five children's theaters, four puppet theaters, four children's moving picture theaters and a symphony orchestra for children. Twenty thousand Moscow children with mechanical talent attend so-called technical stations after school hours to experiment with radio, electricity, machine-building, aviation and architecture.

For Proper Use of Leisure

Educators undertake to organize holiday leisure. Summer camps are intended eventually to receive every child for one month. Moscow summer playgrounds receive 55,000 children for eight hours daily, providing full meals and supervising play and study. In every neighborhood volunteer workers supervise games.

As long as possible delinquent children are kept wih normal groups, whose influence is considered most beneficial. For those whose home influence is considered unsatisfactory, "children's cities" have been established in municipal parks where they spend the entire day.

For children who have committed minor crimes, school hours are extended, and winter playgrounds and clubs are organized in which their entire waking life is supervised. During holidays such children spend all their time, day and night, with supervisors.

Moscow has established 35 receiving stations for youthful wanderers taken off the streets. The city has 1020 "social inspectors" who investigate every such case, and seek to remove the causes of delinquency.

If parents are adjudged responsible, social pressure is brought upon them through trade unions, and other organizations. If no economic or moral causes for misbehavior can be discovered, children are turned over to a special delinquency department of the Commissariat of Education.

Begin With the Parents

Unwholesome home influence is considered a major factor in juvenile delinquency, and education of parents is being constantly extended. Special advisers for parents with difficult children have been appointed in every district, and "parents' universities" are set up in every large factory and office.

The absence of all "crime news" in the accepted sense, not only from periodicals, books, moving picture and theatrical productions, is regarded by Soviet educators as a major assistance in preventing juvenile crime. Crimes are reported only when criminals have been detected and when crimes are considered to have "social significance." This policy is closely observed.

Communism often has been described as a new religion, and in Soviet Russia the Communist Party surely attempts to cultivate something resembling spiritual culture among its followers and in its training organizations for youths and children.

Young Communists and Pioneers are imbued with an almost mystical zeal for social welfare and are taught to regard themselves as models of conduct. On the other hand, however, the defects of a system which holds up all older religions to ridicule and scorn and explains the riddle of existence on purely material grounds are sufficiently apparent.

Turning to the other extreme of the dictatorial scale it is found that a striking decrease in the number of crimes committed in Italy during the last few years is largely attributed to measures adopted by the Fascist Administration for the prevention of crime.

Keeps Youth Out of Mischief

Political considerations have induced the Fascist Government to give particular attention to the young generation. This is being achieved by various institutions such as the "Opera Nazionale Dopolavoro" (After Working Hours), the National Balilla Institution, the Avanguardisti, and other similar organizations for the young.

There is hardly a single village in Italy without its branch of the Dopolavoro institution. After their daily toil, workers resort to these clubs and places of recreation instead of frequenting wine shops. The whole moral atmosphere has distinctly improved, with the result that each year the number of crimes decreases.

The streets of Naples up to a few years ago infested by hordes of "scugnizzi"—poor little waifs and strays abandoned to themselves who gave the greatest contingent to the Camorra, once a secret political and criminal organization—now present a different sight. The "scugnizzi" have disappeared. For the most part they are now on training-ships, where they are taught a trade and receive elementary instruction.

In Sicily, Fascism has uprooted the Mafia, the famous secret criminal society, which used to "educate" to delinquency a large number of young boys.

A notable step toward the prevention of crime by minors has been achieved by the foundation, last July, of a special court for minors. The principal task of this court is to re-educate erring juveniles and to bring them back to social life.

Baldwin Seeks Wider Basis For His Party's Aims

Conservatives Favor State Control Of Industry With Safeguards

The broadening of the basis of Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald's National Government is the main outcome of the Conservative Party conference at Bristol which concluded Oct. 5, states the Christian Science Monitor.

Before addressing this conference, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, party leader, attended a Cabinet meeting at London where he discussed the situation not only with the Prime Minister but with Mr. R. B. Bennett, Gen. Jar Christian Smuts and Mr. Stanley M. Bruce, who represented Canada, South Africa and Australia, respectively in welcoming Mr. MacDonald on his return to England.

At Bristol Mr. Baldwin swept away all party issues in the interests of maintaining national ideals. He insisted on the need for "not a class party, but a party for all classes." He also indicated the National Government's support for "an international convention for the regulation of coal mine work hours" and for work sharing at home to reduce unemployment. His silence on the pending Indian reforms is regarded as foreshadowing a reshaping of the White Paper scheme in order to promote greater unanimity.

Sir Herbert Samuel, leader of the Liberals who resigned from the National Government, said at Dundee last night that the whole Liberal Party supports the White Paper.

President Roosevelt's recent references to England's stability were used on Oct. 7 night as campaign thunder by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, leader of the Conservative Party.

In what was regarded as the opening gun in the drive for votes in the next general election, Mr. Baldwin praised the National Government's accomplishments and said, he will remain the party's chief.

"Did you notice," he said, "that in the last fortnight the French Prime Minister and the President of the United States, each bade their people look across the sea to the little island? The answer is that our Constitution has grown up in the way it has."

Mr. Baldwin appealed to employers to abolish overtime and give work to greater numbers of people. He pointed out that 800,000 more persons are employed now than when the coalition Government was formed.

The reorganization of British industry through a modified state control was demanded yesterday in a resolution approved here by the convention.

Countering Socialist plans for nationalization of industry should Labor control the Government in the future, Mr. Noel Ker Lindsay, member of the House of Commons, submitted a resolution urging the Cabinet to adopt a scheme of industrial reconstruction.

"It is the duty of the party," he declared, "to resolve as quickly as possible the paradox of poverty midst plenty."

Mr. Lindsay urged a plan giving industry the power to set its own house in order under governmental supervision.

A resolution urging a national lottery was adopted by a large majority. It asked the Government to make immediate plans to establish the lottery, which the conservatives believe would attract much British money now sent to Ireland for various sweepstakes. Sponsored by Sir William S. Davison, member of the House of Commons, the resolution urged that facilities for the lottery be granted through the Post Office.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Father of Boston

St. Botolph or Botulf (meaning-Helping Wolf) went to Germany to study and there became a Benedictine monk. Upon his return to England the king of the South Angles gave him a site on which to erect a monastery. The grant was on the river Witham, in Lincolnshire, England, and the church erected there is known as St. Botolph's Church. A town grew up around the church which was finally named Boston, a contraction of the name Botolph's Town. When the Puritans settled Massachusetts, the capital, which was originally called Trimountain, was renamed Boston in 1630 after the town in Lincolnshire from which the most influential of the settlers came.

The Postmaster's Autograph

In March 1933 a sale of the Thoroton collection, including the signatures of all the Presidents of the United States, realized a total fo $200. The one penny black Bermuda stamp of 1849 bearing the autograph of Postmaster Perot without which the stamp would be invalid, sold for $825 in London recently.

Woman Missionary Released By Bandits

Chinese Outlaws Still Hold Two Of Five Victims

Rengo

PEIPING, Oct. 22—Miss C. Emblem of the China Inland Mission at Chenyuan, in Kweichow, who was captured on Oct. 9 by bandits, has now been released, according to advices reaching Peiping to-day.

Besides Miss Emblem, the bandits originally seized Mr. and Mrs. A. Hayman and another missionary couple, Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Bosshardt. The two married women, however, were released recently so as to convey the demand of the bandits for a ransom of $100,000 for each of the remaining captives.

Messrs. Hayman and Bosshardt are still in captivity.

Miss Emblem states that the bandits are heading north through districts where no foreign missions are located. All women missionaries, she adds, have been withdrawn from Kweichow mission stations exposed to the Communist menace.

One of the most interesting meetings in the history of the Tokyo Women's club was that held Monday at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Kikusaburo Fukui where Mr. Fukui's rare and valued collection of porcelain was exhibited and where members of the club heard Mr. Fukui speak on the "Human Elements in Ceramic Art."

Mrs. J. D. Hitch, Jr., in opening the meeting, declared that the club was grateful to Mr. Fukui for the unusual opportunity he had made possible. Mrs. Russell Durgin, chairman of the art department, introduced Mr. Fukui who said in part:

"There is a close connection between the essence of ceramic work and that of human life. To be more exact, I am even of the opinion that without comprehension of the truth of human life, we can never understand the truth of ceramic work.

"The truth of human life can never be grasped or comprehended if we are absorbed day in, day out, in the pursuit of material ends in life. We can attain a complete form of life only by consistent and constant introspection and self improvement. Then material things such as name and wealth sink into the impotence of mere implements, mere servants, and not masters, in our life.

"In the daily intercourse of individuals and nations, and in the dealings of one state with another, we all should be guided by open and warm hearted sentiment and moved by friendly and sympathetic aspirations. If we know no better than to go through the world wearing an expression of sour resentment and grim determination to drive a cold, close bargain here and to pick a quarrel there, we may perhaps win material advantages for a time, but such an attitude toward life can only lead to self-destruction."

Mr. Fukui continued to draw a parallel between human life and ceramic art and then he declared:

"In speaking briefly of the history of the ceramic ware of Japan in comparison with other countries, we may say that in Japan the ceramic art has kept pace with the development of the country. In the case of China, Turkey, Persia and certain other countries of Europe, while they produced excellent articles of pottery and porcelain in the distant past, the situation at the present time would indicate that the development has ceased and the art has become extinct.

"But in Japan we find that even today, ceramic ware is surpassing that of ancient times and is being produced all over the country.

"Generally speaking, in most countries, articles of fine art have been preserved only in museums, but fortunately in Japan, because of the progress of the nation's culture under the benediction of the perpetual Imperial line, craftsmen have passed on their knowledge to their sons and the latter in turn to their sons so that new methods have been invented to produce articles of superior workmanship.

"I want to emphasize this and to point out that a study of Japanese ceramics will reveal what the Japanese spirit really means. Those of you who are inclined to believe that Japanese civilization is based on mere imitation of other countries will find something far deeper than mere imitation if you study the underlying spirit of ceramic art and apply this to the study of our civilization as a whole."

Following the lecture, which was given in the reception room of the home which overlooked the gardens on which a touch of fall had been placed, tea was served in the living room and Japanese delicacies in the garden. Among the exhibits was one showing the process in the making of porcelain. Another contained remnants of a vase that had been excavated in the Ainu district and which was believed to have been fashioned in 2000 B.C.

Upon entering the Fukui home, members and guests were given rice paper booklets illustrating the process of Japanese ceramic art.

Soviet Campaign Vs. Religion Asked

League of Atheists has been permitted to form an "Anti-Religious Cell" in every school, farm and factory. The Commissariat of Education cooperates with the league in anti-religious work among children.

Mr. Yaroslavsky undoubtedly presented the viewpoint of the Kremlin when he told teachers: "The harmful influence of religion disorganizes labor, especially where peasants predominate." Every Communist leader is frankly and vigorously anti-religious and the ruling party in Russia is definitely committed to an anti-religious policy.

The new campaign therefore is a logical step in executing Communist policy.

Luxury Vetoed By Eucharistic Session Legate

Cardinal Pacelli To Live Simply Despite Pomp On Arrival At Buenos Aires

A simple chamber awaits Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, Papal lagate to the thirty-second Eucharistic Congress on his arrival here on Oct. 9, to open the congress the following day, says the New York Herald Tribune. In contrast to the pomp and public ovation planned, the room in which he retires for the night will be plain in accordance with his own request.

With the mansion of the Countess of Oimo, Argentina's richest woman land-owner, at his disposal, he telegraphed orders that "my chamber be simple."

A plain black cross, a painting of the Virgin of Lourdes, and a holy-water stoup are the only decorations relieving the bareness of the pearl-gray walls. A dark oak bed, a stool, an escritoire, several plain chairs, and a wardrobe without a mirror furnish the room.

One step outside the chamber is a broad marble-covered hall, decorated in scarlet and gold and with numerous crystal chandeliers, the scene of many of Argentina's brilliant social gatherings.

Considered Brilliant Diplomat

Cardinal Pacelli, bearer of many honors, lives a simple life. A prince of the Church, Papel legate "a Latere," he is considered one of the most brilliant pontificial diplomats. Among his title are Arch-Priest of the Patriarchal Basilica Vaticana, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of St. Peter, Grand Chancellor of the Pontifical Institute of Christian Archeology, Secretary of State of the Pope.

He also is a member of the Congregation of the Sacred Office, of the Consistory, of the Ceremonial, of the Extraordinary Affairs of Seminaries, and of the University of Ecclesiastical Studies. He is a member of the Pontifical Commission for Biblical Studies, President of the Administration of the Holy See, and Cardinal Protector of more than forty-five important institutions.

While the devout awaited this week Papel Legate's arrival, the first religious art exhibition was inaugurated this week, opening the official Eucharistic congress program. The exhibition is considered one of the most comprehensive collections of aboriginal Guarini and southern South American art.

The collection is especially rich in original wood and stone carvings from the sixteenth century Jesuit mission states of Uruguay. More than 1,100 objects worked by the "lost Arcadians" of the first Jesuit state were brought together for the first time since the Mameluco warriors of Sao Paulo overran the Jesuit reductions in the early seventeenth century.

Great Altar Screens Shown

They range from three-inch, intricately carved statuettes to massive fifteen-foot painted wooden screens which once flanked the Jesuit altar of San Ignacio. The American section filled one floor of the large Avenida Alvear mansion, placed at the disposal of the Congress committee by Otto Bemberg, wealthy Argentine. Among the exhibits were specimens of colonial Peruvian and Bolivian gold and silver work.

Peter Proclaimed King At Rites In Belgrade

Marie, telegrams of condolence.

The funeral arrangements for Alexander are still unsettled as it is desired to consult Queen Maria on her arrival. It is unlikely to take place before Wednesday, as the captain of the Yugoslav destroyer Dubrovnik, which is bringing Alexander's body, wirelessed that heavy storms were delaying the ship.

When the coffin is landed at Split it will be placed in a special funeral train and slowly transported across Alexander's kingdom to Belgrade, halting for a while only at Zagreb, its second capital. Peasants will line most of the route as the train carries past them the body of the ruler under whom the Southern Slavic races found unity.

King Carol of Rumania will be represented at the funeral by his brother Nicholas. Marshal Henri Petain and Francois Pietri, Minister of Colonies, will represent France. It is thought possible that as a gesture of reconciliation Crown Prince Humbert of Italy may be present and it is hoped that the Duke of York and the Duke of Kent will come from England.

From all parts of the country telegrams arrive hourly announcing the decision of peasant societies and delegations to participate in their picturesque national costumes in the funeral in Belgrade. It is expected that the normal population of this little capital of 300,000 persons will be at least trebled on the day of the funeral.

Dr. Alkalay, chief rabbi of Yugoslavia, sent a circular to his co-religionists reminding them that Alexander had always been a protector of the Jews and urging them to take a full part in the national mourning.

Premier Uronovich tendered the resignation of the Cabinet today to the Regency, but he was requested to continue his government.

Munich Police Quell Bavarian Religious Riot

Pastor Sommerer has been appointed "spiritual commissar" for the new diocese.

Simultaneously Dr. Mueller suspended from office not only Bishop Meisser but all the other officials of the Bavarian Lutheran church. The official organ of the Bavarian church has been suppressed and the Bavarian Bishop and his associates have been forbidden to make any sort of statement or issue any publication.

Nevertheless, the Munich newspapers were allowed to publish only the news of the creation of the new diocese and not the fact that Bishop Meisser had been placed under arrest and suspended.

There can be no doubt that Dr. Meisser enjoys the full support of the greater part of the active protestant laity and virtually every Protestant pastor in his diocese. This was recently demonstrated by the unanimous vote of confidence that he received from the diocesan synod elected last Summer.

Almost all the Bavarian pastors, as members of the free confessional synod, have declared formally to their parishoners that they will never recognize Reich Bishop Mueller as head of the Protestant church in Germany.

Change In A.F.L. Control Sought By Lewis Bloc

Green Opposed By Influential Group Who Wish To Gain Control Of Council

The second week of the American Federation of Labor Convention, starting Oct 8, at San Francisco will witness the outcome of efforts being made by one influential group virtually to "revolutionize" the makeup of the powerful Executive Council, which guides the destinies of organized labor, says the New York Times.

Led by John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, the unions that seek to dominate the Executive Council, now governed by the "Old Guard," will fight to enlarge that body.

President William Green is the leader of the administration forces, opposing enlargement of the council beyond the present eleven members, eight vice presidents and the president, secretary and treasurer of the federation. Mr. Lewis has offered a resolution to have the council consist of twenty-five members.

A victory for the administration forces would mean continuance of the present policy of the governing body with relation to many vital problems contronting the federation. If the Lewis bloc wins, a more militant and progressive policy is promised with regard to organization in the mass prpoduction industries and labor legislation in the next Congress.

Union Leaders Lobbying

A two-hour conference of the Lewis forces took place on Oct. 6. Those present included Daniel J. Tobin, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, and W. D. Hutcheson, president of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters.

Other unions are being approached to lend support to this combination, as a two-thirds vote on the roll call will be necessary to adopt an amendment to the constitution enlarging the council.

David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, controlling more than 10 per cent of the votes in the convention—that of the needle trades bloc—is in a strategic position to thwart or assist the Lewis group in its struggle to enlarge the governing council.

Sharp debate will also be furnished on the report to be made by the resolutions committee on the resolutions seeking a clear-cut statement on the federation policy governing industrial versus craft unions.

If the Lewis forces should be victorious the federation's stand on industrial unionism would be clarified to the extent that the vertical union would be unqualifiedly endorsed for the mass production industries such as rubber, steel and automobiles, while craft unions would not be molested in their own fields.

Green Speaks on Ethical Aim

President Green, speaking at the First Congregational Church on Oct. 7 on "Application of Religious Principles to Human Relations in Industry," expressed opposition to "class war" and said that if capital and labor were to wage it "then religion and ethics have failed."

"The American Federation of Labor refuses to embrace such a philosophy or accept such a pessimistic theory," he declared, adding that the struggle in the industrial field was between "the forces of self-righteousness and those of righteousness."

Pleading for a balancing of bargaining power between employer and employee, Mr. Green maintained that the policy of collective bargaining, wage agreements and arbitration of disputes "rests upon a basis of high ethical standards and doctrines, the teachings and precepts of religion."

He said that there was no influence which counteracted and nullified the work and influence of the church among the masses of people so much as industrial oppression and exploitation. Oppressed working men and women, he said, could not understand a social state in which extreme riches and extreme poverty dividing the two convention weeks is known as Labor Sunday and usually officers of the federation occupy several pulpits expounding the aims of organized labor. A score of leaders addressed congregations in the local churches.

14,000,000. Idle

Robert J. Watt, of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor, will furnish the federation convention with the results of a state-wide survey of unemployment indicating that, exclusive of those employed on government projects, 14,000,000 are now estimated to be idle in the United States.

The federation's figures showing upward of 10,000,000 unemployed, according to Mr. Watt, are conservative. The survey on which he is reporting is the result of a house-to-house canvass made by the Massachusetts Department of Labor and Industry at an expense of $550,000 supplied by the government.

Said to be the only State census of unemployment made in several years, it excludes housewives, students, persons unable to work, retired and aged persons or those not seeking employment.

The Massachusetts figures as of June 13, an advance copy of which was obtained by Mr. Watt, show that in the State were 1,808,840 employable persons. Of these 624,526, or 34½ per cent were wholly or partially employed.

Based on the 1930 United States census of 48,829,920 employable persons in the nation, it was estimated that the State figures, if applied to the country, would mean 16,846,322 wholly or temporarily unemployed.

Including those employed on government projects as having jobs the idle would be placed as 9,328,514; excluding them would place the wholly unemployed at 14,014,086.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Fighting Bridge

Abdul Hamid, Sultan of Turkey, nursed a lifetime grudge against his navy for having taken part in the deposition of his predecessor. He feared that its guns might again be trained on his palace, and so allowed his Minister of Marine to appropriate to his own private use a budget of from one to two million dollars annually alloted for naval repair.

As a result, the Turkish Navy was practically non-existent. A "cruiser" dispatched to a Red Sea port was left riding at anchor for so long that it was overgrown with tropical foliage and could not be moved. Another "warship," when sent to an Egyptian port, returned after a few months reporting that it could not find its destination.

Between 1898 and 1910 the only "battleship" carried on the books of the Ministry of Marine was the famous Galata Bridge, which connects the suburb of Galata with Stamboul across the Golden Horn. The Minister even managed to let the bridge participate in the annual "fleet maneuvers," although it was stationary and could not be moved except by magic.

GIFT TO TENNESSEE

Residents of Nashville, Tenn., will probably be surprised to see large cloth "carp flags" flying over the Board of Missions building there early next May.

When the Asama Maru sails Thursday it will carry carp flags to the Board of Missions of Nashville from the International Goodwill "Koi-Nobori" (carp flag) Society of Japan. Each year the society sends a number of "peace missions" in the form of sets of the carp flags to young people's groups and organizations in many different countries. This symbol, the society hopes, flying over the soil of the several nations, will characterize Japan's sincere desire for world peace.

The society was founded to carry out the ideals and plans of the late Eiichi Doi who died in the midst of an international friendship project on Sept. 9, 1933. During the last three years of his life, he conceived the idea of sending a pair of carp flags to certain individuals in different countries where he had made contacts. He felt strongly that the promotion of international peace called for a type of courage comparable to the traditional Japanese symbol of perseverance and courage such as the carp.

In sending the gift, the International Goodwill "Koi-Nobori" Society includes a message explaining how the carp flag is flown on the Boys' Festival day in Japan, may 5th.

Among the noted sponsors of the society are Count Yoshinori Hutara, member of the House of Peers and head of the Boy Scout Movement in Japan; Dr. Masaharu Anezaki, Professor Emeritus of Tokyo Imperial university Dr. Junjiro Takakusu, noted Buddhist scholar; Mr. Gumpei Yamamuro, chief of the Japanese Salvation Army; Mr. Eisaku Wada, president of the Tokyo School of Fine Arts; Mr. Soichi Saito, National General Secretary of the young Men's General Christian Association; Dr. Yotaro Sugimura, former assistant secretary-general of the League of Nations Secretariat; Mr. Sakusaburo Uchigasaki, member of the Lower house of the Diet; Mr. Yusuke Tsurumi, author and lecturer; and Mr. Kenkichi Yoshizawa ex-Foreign Minister.

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Numerous Species Of This Bird Are Divided Into Three General Groups

By HANS HUNTER

These short notes on the management of pheasants were collected and compiled for my own use from various books and articles published by authoritative writers both in England and in America. Consequently the notes are made as short as possible and yet comprehensive enough to make them sufficient for practical purposes. These notes are divided into four short chapters, namely History and Species; Converts Management in Preserves; Hand Rearing in Pens; and Diseases of Pheasant.

Mr. Hans Hunter

Chapter I.

It appears that the first mention of pheasants, their breeding, caring pheasant chicks, and feeding them for the table, was made in the days of the Roman Empire by the writing of Palladius in his De Re Rustica—dated some time between A. D. 300 and 400. Various records in evidence that in certain estates in England, pheasants were reared as far back as as 1790, and it is pretty certain that the rearing of pheasants under hens was a well known practice in England at the end of the eighteenth century.

All birds are divided into three general groups. There are the "Orders" which contain more than one "Genus" which in turn covers more than one "Species".

The Order Gallinae, under which membership include pheasants, as well as Turkeys, Domestic Fowls, Guinea Fowl, Peafowl, Grouse, Quails, Partridges, Golden and Silver pheasants. The pheasants in these notes are so called proper pheasants, game birds constituting the Genus or group known to naturalists under the title "Phasianus".

Numerous Species

The species of pheasants enumerated by Mr. Ogilvie Grant in his work on "Game Birds" are:—

1.	The Common Pheasant	(Phasianus Colchicus)
2.	The Persian "	(P. Persicus)
3.	Prince of Wales "	(P. Principalis)
4.	Zerafshan "	(P. Zerafshanicus)
5.	Shaw's "	(P. Shawi)
6.	Tarim "	(P. Tarimensis)
7.	Oxus "	(P. Chrysomelas)
8.	Mongolian "	(P. Mongolicus)
9.	Chinese "	(P. Torquatus)
10.	The Satschuen "	(P. Satschuenensis)
11.	Formosan "	(P. Formosanus)
12.	Chinese Ringless "	(P. Decollatus)
13.	Stranchi's "	(P. Stranchi)
14.	Vlangalis "	(P. Vlangalii)
15.	Stone's "	(P. Elegans)
16.	Japanese "	(P. Versicolor)
17.	Soemmerings "	(P. Soemmeringi)
18.	Reeves' "	(P. Reevesii)
19.	Ijima's "	(P. Ijimae)
20.	Berezowsky's "	(P. Berezowskyi)
21.	Sundarian "	(P. Alpherakyi)

No. 19 described by Mr. H. E. Dresser in "The Ibis."
Nos. 20-21 by Hon. Walter Rothschild.

All above species will interbreed without trouble and produce fertile young. But it is wisest to confine one's activities to pure-bred stock, for the species in their already fine state are game birds worthy of the name.

In these notes, the particular consideration is given to the management of such as, (P. Versicolr) The Japanese pheasant, (P. Mongolicus) Mongolian and (P. Torquatus) (The Chinese). These, however, are so closely related in structure, form and habits, that their natural history and general management may be given once for all and their distinctive peculiarities pointed out subsequently.

The pheasants, the members of genus Phasianus, are readily distinguished by their tail feathers, which are eighteen in number, the middle pair being much the longest, and these attain their maximum development in the Reeves and Soemmerings pheasants, reaching in these species to a length of five and six feet.

Not Domestic Bird

The pheasants are game birds, while in some cases they are known to be tamed the instinct of domestication is absent and is not a member of that very few (only about 50) animals domesticated by man in last thousand of years—and although pheasants have been bred in aviaries for many generations, their offsprings still retain their original wildness and when let out at large betake themselves to the woods as they are able to shift for themselves.

On the other hand, the allied species, the jungle fowls (Gallus Ferrugineus) the original of our domestic breeds of poultry, if reared in confinement, become immediately domesticated.

The difference between a game bird and a domesticated bird is, that one is temperamentally suited to the woods and shooting and the other is not. A game bird is one which flushes well, does its best to elude hunter and forms a welcome addition to his menu.

The pheasants in native state are essentially forest birds, frequenting the margins of wood coming into the open tracts in search of food and retreating into the thick underwood at the slightest cause for alarm. Its favorite places of resort are thick plantations, or tangled woods by streams, where, among the long grass, brambles, and other shrubs, it passes the night, sleeping on the ground in summer and autumn but commonly roosting in the trees in winter.

The pheasants is an omnivorous feeder. Nauruarm gives the following description of its dietary. Its food consist of grains, seeds, fruits, berries, green herbs, insects and worms, acorns, beech-mast. Ants, and particularly their larvae or eggs are a favorite food, the latter (eggs) forming the chief support of the young. It also eats many green weeds, shoots of grass, cabbage, clover, cress, pimpernal, peas, etc. Of berries—all the wild berries—plums, apples, peas, cherries, mulberries, grapes. Pheasants are at time carnivorous feeding on mice, reptiles, snakes and slugs. Also eats spangles of the oak leaf so common in the autumn. These spangles contain eggs of gall-fly.

Roosevelt Leads Chorus Of Denials Of Inflation Talk

He And Bulkley Say Subject Was Not Mentioned In White House Conference

President Roosevelt on October 12 let administration authorities in throwing cold water on inflation speculation which flared up the day before as a result of visiting to the White House by Senator Bulkley of Ohio and Professor George Warren, the commodity dollar advocate, says the Washington correspondent of the New York Times.

The President said that his talk with Senator Bulkley, a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, was chiefly about Ohio politics, and that they had not even mentioned the prospect of further devaluation of the dollar. He added that many persons had gained a wrong impression from the coincidence of the visit of the Senator and Professor Warren.

Senator Bulkley was one of the most surprised persons in Washington, according to his representations, when he awoke on October 12 to find that assertions he had made on leaving the White House had been taken as a forecast of inflation. Any impression that he had advised the President of a necessity for further action by Congress in devaluing the dollar was "entirely in error."

"In the first place," he said, "I am opposed to further action by Congress at this time. There is no necessity for it and there is no prospect of it."

President's Powers Pointed Out

The Ohio Senator pointed out that the President had the authority to reduce the value of the dollar from its present 59.06 cents to 50 cents under the act passed by the last Congress. He expressed a belief, however, that the President had no present intention of using that authority for further inflationary purposes.

"My information is quite to the contrary," he said when asked if the President had intimated to him any purpose of another cut in the gold content of the dollar.

President Roosevelt left the door somewhat open as regards his monetary policy, but, from his tone at a press conference, he obviously sought to minimize the possibility of a change in the near future.

When questioned about future gold policy, he said he was neither a prestidigitator nor an astrologer, but quickly added that some persons had gained a wrong impression from yesterday's developements.

Senator Bulkley said he had not sought, when he left the White House to give any impression of the President's attitude or even to suggest that he had talked monetary matters. His mission in seeing the President, he said, was to press the candidacy of Representative West of Ohio for the budget directorship and to discuss the political situation in his State.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

A Dozen Seidels Upside Down

Charles Porter of Glebe, Sydney, Australia, who drinks 12 glasses of beer while standing on his head, is about 40 years old and has discovered that he can drink more beer in this acrobatic attitude than if he were normally leaning against a bar.

He is a popular town character, well known to tourists. His first upside down drinking was a prank, but he has since turned many an honest dollar by becoming a professional. He is able to stand on his head balancing himself with one arm while he uses the other to carry the seidels to his lips. He usually winds up his performance by playing a mandolin still standing on his head.

Oil Of Mustard

The seeds of the black mustard contain a bland, fixed oil which is removed by expression. But the oil so removed is not the volatile, pungent, colorless oil of mustard. The latter is produced by the action of myrosin on potassium myronate, in the presence of water.

Myrosin and potassium m. are both contained in the black mustard seed. After the fixed oil has been removed, the crushed seeds are treated with water and distilled, yielding the volatile oil of mustard.

New Zeppelin Nearly Ready

Craft Almost Twice As Large As Graf Scheduled For Completion In March

The "bigger and better" airship now under construction at the Zeppelin Company's wharf at Friedrichshafen Germany, will be finished in March, 1935, says the Berlin correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune. The craft, known as the LZ-129, will differ from the Zeppelins constructed heretofore, because the ship is to be filled with non-combustible helium gas, besides being differently shaped.

The new ship provides twenty-five bedrooms, with berths for fifty passengers, while the Graf Zeppelin can house twenty-four tourists only. The craft's maximum speed will be about 135 kilometers an hour. Her capacity of 190,000 cubic meters nominal gas volume is considered sufficient to maintain the necessary radius.

Four Diesel Engines Used

The LZ-129 will be the first airship to be driven by crude oil motors at a maximum of 5,000 horsepower. She is equipped with four Diesel machines installed in gondolas which, like the system employed heretofore, are suspended outside the ship's body. Each gondola contains all the equipment required for the smooth working of the motor concerned, and commands the necessary space not only for supervising the engine, but for making repairs. The gondola is accessible by special entrances from the ship's hull.

The new airship will carry fuel supplies of about 60,000 kilograms of heavy oil to be stored in her hold in a number of single tanks. The LZ-129 is nearly twice as big as the Graf Zeppelin, her predecessor, and somewhat exceeds in size the American craft Macon. Her hull is streamlined. It is 248 meters long, while its diameter at its widest amounts to 41.2 meters, thus showing a less slender outline than the Graf Zeppelin's.

Framework of Duraluminum

The hull is constructed with vertical sprung mainstays, unsprung auxiliary stays and frames fixed between the mainstays. The material from which the framework is built is specially strong duraluminum, while high-grade steel wires have been used for staying. The envelope required 85,000 square meters of fabric against 20,000 employed in the construction of the Graf Zeppelin.

After the fabric is stretched over the framework it will get a fivefold coating of cellulose varnish containing 3 per cent of aluminum pigment to make it weatherproof. Exposed aluminum parts will be coated with transparent blue varnish to protect them against oxydization. Fuel gas will be stored in sixteen gas chambers, all of which are independent of each other. They are equipped with safety valves. The chambers are made from a special material manufactured by a Berlin company.

The passengers' rooms are located midship. While in the Graf Zeppelin they occupied about 100 square meters, roughly 400 square meters will be at the passengers' disposal in the new ship, about 200 being devoted to living rooms.

Smoking Room Provided

With the danger of combustibility removed by using helium gas, a smoking room is provided for passengers for the first time in the history of airships. The rooms are arranged on two decks, one above the other. The upper, chief deck, contains bedrooms, a big dining room and writing and reading room, as well as lobbies with a long flight of windows.

He said that some of the masks date back to the 1300 B.C., that they have not been shown for many years and that they may not be exhibited again during the lifetime of many in the audience. As the masks are so old, unusual care must be taken to preserve them.

Ugly, whimsical, grotesque, learing, overjoyed, sad, and intoxicated were the ancient faces, and the collection showed every emotion known and imaginable. There were masks representing a demon, a bird that had turned into a human being, the god of thunder, the Seven Gods of Happiness, a fox, a monkey, a drunken guest, and the incarnation of jealousy. A few of the masks had part of their faces missing many looked their age but all bespoke a past of having provided countless happy hours for countless generations.

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Bird's Value To Farmer Not Sufficiently Appreciated; Food Has Wide Range

By HANS HUNTER

The value of pheasants to the farmer is scarcely sufficiently appreciated; the birds destroy enormous numbers of injurious insects—among them wire-worms and the grubs of the Bibionidae which travel in clusters devouring the roots of grasses and cereals and are picked up by pheasants, hundreds at a time. Several instances of these large numbers of Bibionidae having been devoured by pheasants have been recorded in the Field Magazine. From the crop of one pheasant over 1200 grubs have been taken—from another 726 grubs, one acorn, one snail, nine berries and three grains of wheat—which would indicate a distinct preference for insect food over cereals; and the contents of a third crop consisting of more than 600 grubs of Bibionidae, removed by Dr. Hammond Smith may be seen in the Central Hall of the Natural History Museum in South Kensington, London. As another instance of their insectivorous character may be mentioned in the complaint of Waterton, that they had extirpated the grasshoppers from Walton Park. They also eat Molluscous animals.

Mr. John Bishop, of Llanclovey, killed a pheasant on the coast of Islay whose crop was filled with the coloured snail's shells abounding on the bents or grass stems on the coast. At the meeting of the British Ornithologists' Club, October 21, 1896. He exhibited some snail shell (Helix Nemoralis) of full size, no fewer than 48 of which I had taken out of the crop of a pheasant.

Lord Lilford, in his work of the "Birds of Northamptonshire" writes, "the pheasant, where not preserved in unreasonable numbers, is a good friend to the farmer, from enormous number of wire worms and other noxious insects which it devours, to say nothing of its liking for roots of various weeds in preference to grain."

Birds Are Carnivorous

The pheasants are sometimes carnivorous in their appetite; following record shows:—

Mr. Hutton, of Northallerton, recorded that he found a pheasant dead without violent cause and on searching the gullet he extracted a short-tailed mouse, which had doubtless caused death by strangulation.

Rev. U. Bathurst, in a letter published in London's Magazine of Natural History vol.ii. p. 153. relates that Sir John Ogilvy saw a pheasant flying off with a common slow-worm (Anguis Fragilis).

Mr. J. E. Harting, in "The Birds of Middlesex" says "on examining the crop of a pheasant, shot in October 1864, I was surprised to find in it a common slow-worm (Anguis Fragilis) which measured eight inches in length.

In October 1888, Mr. J. B. Footner, of Tunbridge Wells sent to the Field, three young vipers that were found with five others of equal size in the crop of a three quarters grown hen pheasant. Their length was 7 inches and weight ¼ ounce.

Mr. G. F. Passmore, of Speranza, Exeter, writing in the Field of June 2, 1900 states: "An extraordinary fatality occurred to one of my hen pheasant, confined with a number of others in a large pen, at Lamber, Hatherleigh, North Devon, on Sunday, November 27, between 11 a.m. and 4 p.m. The pheasant, when found, had swallowed about 6 inches of a viper, whilst about 8 inches of the tail of the reptile was protruding from the mouth of the bird. Both the bird and viper were dead."

The pheasant wings, considered with reference to the size and weight of the birds (2 to 4½ lbs.), are short and small; from the secondary quills being nearly as long as the primary, they are rounded in form, the third and fourth primary feathers being the longest. The comparatively small size of the wings necessitates they being moved with great force and velocity, consequently the moving powers or muscles of the breast are very well developed. The wings are not adapted to a very prolonged flight, but in wild birds and in some species, long flights are not altogether beyond the powers of the birds.

The pheasant, like most of its congeners, is a terrestrial bird, seeking its food, making its nest and rearing its young upon the surface of the ground. Its legs, like those of all true sasorial or scratching birds, are strong and muscular, consequently it is capable of running with great speed. The strong blunt claws are admirably suited for scratching seeds and tuberous roots from the ground, or worms and larvae from beneath the fallen leaves.

Pheasants Can Swim

The pheasant, though seldom taking voluntarily to water, is quite capable of swimming and even diving underneath, records of which are found in several writings.

The display of the plumage during courtship by males varies in almost every species of gallinaceous birds, and in case of pheasant is described by Mr. T. W. Wood, in an interesting article on the "Courtship of Birds." Pheasants seem to possess no other mode of display than the lateral or one sided method. In this the males disport themselves so as to exhibit to the females a greater number of their beautiful feathers than could otherwise be seen at one view. In the peculiar attitude assumed by the male, the wing of the side nearest the female is partly opened and depressed, and the tail is expanded, while the bright vermilion skin around the eye is greatly extended and the little purple aigrettes erected.

The nest of the female is usually a simple hollow scraped in the ground. After depositing her eggs, usually about eight or nine, she is deserted by the male, and the task of incubation and rearing the young depends on her alone. The eggs vary in color from a greenish brown to a greyish green; in size, on the average, are 1-5/16 inches in length by 1-5/12 inches in width. The period of incubation is 23 days on the average.

Clarkson Dies; Wig Maker For World's Royalty

London Costumer Dressed Heads Of Empresses And Actresses For 58 Years

William Clarkson, internationally famous theatrical costumer and leading perruquier to the London theaters and opera houses for fifty years, died at London on October 13, according to the New York Herald Tribune. He suffered a stroke a few hours after attending a premiere. He was seventy-three years old, and had been in business since the age of fifteen.

"Wigs by Clarkson" was a phrase that in the course of the last half century had become as much a part of the English theater as George Bernard Shaw. Though the shadows of Clarkson's quaint old shop, in Wardour Street, Soho, stalked the ghosts of Europe's histrionic immortals—Tree, Melba, Bernhardt, Terris, Patti, Duse, Irving and Lily Langtry.

To Clarkson came kings and queens, princes, potentates and peers, whenever an impending masquerado demanded professional counsel on matters of sartorial adornment.

Besides providing equipment for most of the important stage productions in London and provincial theaters for forty years, Willie Clarkson devoted his art to creating disguises for persons who could show a legitimate reason for desiring them. It was even said that he employed his grease paint and his skill to obliterate black eyes and other traces of the night before. He admitted that on occasion criminals had tricked him into employing his talents in their behalf. One notorious case was that of Charles Peace, the murderer, who induced Clarkson, in all innocence, to equip him with a most deceptive mustache and beard.

Then there was the famous hoax of the Sultan of Zanzibar and the Cambridge dons, wherein Clarkson was a witting or unwitting conspirator. While the real Sultan of Zanzibar was in London, an individual named H. de Vere Cole, equipped by Clarkson with costume, complexion and cohorts, visited Cambridge University and there was welcomed with full academic pomp.

Some time afterward the same conspirators, mightily pleased with themselves, visited Clarkson's again, arrayed themselves this time as Abyssinian dignitaries and visited a battleship where they were greeted with ruffles and flourishes and all naval fanfare.

Had 50,000 Military Uniforms

Clarkson's wardrobe of costumes included 50,000 military uniforms ranging from the time of William the Conqueror to the present, with weapons appropriate to every period.

At a few hours notice he could equip a touring company for almost any play or masquerade. For thirty-six years he was responsible for the make-up of the Military Tournament. For forty years he made all Sarah Bernhardt's wigs, and in 1931 when he announced his intention of retiring it was revealed that he had in his little warehouse across the river 300 wigs worn by the great French actress.

Clarkson attended every one of Bernhardt's first nights for forty years, going to her dressing room before the curtain and rushing out front when she went on stage. The costumier probably held the all-British record for theater-going. He attended three to four premieres every week for sixty years. No gathering of theatrical celebrities was complete without Clarkson and his dandy's clothes, his jolly blue eyes, his beautiful curling beard, always glossy, always fastidiously trimmed.

Born at The Wiggery in Drury Lane, Willie Clarkson played as a boy with the masks and wigs in his father's shop. They were the only toys he knew, and as the years passed he learned the secrets of the trade from the elder Clarkson who also, to a degree, achieved immortality.

Clarkson senior, if not Willie, will live forever, for Charles Dickens was his friend, and the novelist wrote of the Drury Lane perruquier in "Martin Chuzzlewit." Poll Sweedlepipe, landlord to Sairey Gamp, is Dickens's intepretation of the bird-fancying wag of The Wiggery.

Converted Patti to His Favor

Young Willie first met the temperamental Adelina Patti at the age of twelve. Pere Clarkson was ill and his nervous employees hurried the proprietor's son to Covent Garden to pinch hit. At the sight of the curly-haired and terrified child who was to dress her lush tresses for "The Barber of Seville," Patti screamed in derison. But time was short; there was no choice but for Willie to try his hand. A moment later Patti's scorn changed to admiration. She was charmed by the blue-eyed boy and thereafter allowed no hand but his to set her coiffures or make her wigs whenever she came to London.

When Willie was fifteen his father died, and the boy took over The Wiggery and its business. Through the last years of the nineteenth century and first three decades of the twentieth, Master Willie Clarkson ruled London's world of illusion. In 1904 he moved from Drury Lane to Wardour Street. In 1931 he employed more than 200 workmen. Yet in his last years, despite his prosperity and fame, the younger Clarkson longed for the rococo glories of the Victorian era.

Once an empress gave him a huge enameled flower cravat pin, set with a sparkler, and her photograph signed by her own hand. Queen Alexandra murmured on one occasion, "O Mr. Clarkson, you are delightful!" For the glittering tableaux vivants at Windsor Castle Clarkson designed all the costumes which covered the royal figures and all the wigs that topped the royal and noble heads. Then there were the amateur theatricals at Osborne, where Willie supped after the performance with the royal performers.

A Real Day's Work in 1897

Never did he work so hard as for the Devonshire Ball of 1897. On the morning of the ball, Clarkson drove to Buckingham Palace to attend Princess Christian and the Duchess of Connaught; thence to Kensington Palace to wait upon Princess Louise; back to Buckingham Palace for the Duke of Connaught; then to York House for some royal ladies; finally to Marlborough House to care for Euward and Alexandra, and Haakon and Queen Maud of Norway. For each of these exalted individuals Clarkson fixed wigs, dressed hair and made up their faces with his own hands.

From the Duchess of Devonshire Clarkson received an invitation to attend the ball. And when the Prince of Wales saw the perruquier dancing a mazurka with the duchesse, he said: "Really, Mr. Clarkson, looking at you, feel as if I should go home and try to find a costume as handsome; you quite outshine me."

During the diamond jubilee of that year, King Tewahao, last ruler of the Maoris, came under Clarkson's spell and was so pleased with improvements in himself that when he returned to New Zealand he took with him enough grease paint to last many years.

In 1931, when he announced that he was going to retire and write his memoirs, Clarkson said: "I have thought too much of my work to think at all of a wife. But I have learned that one cannot do anything so well but what some one also can do the same. My life has been happy. I shall pass. ... With me shall pass the house of Clarkson."

Takarazuka Show Girls In Dazzling Series

ed by a beautiful scene of men and women skiiers in black, white and silver. Finally, the chorus enters as spirits of the snow, carrying gleaming snow crystals, which they set revolving to form a striking background for Miss Kuniko Ashiwara as a boy and Miss Reiko Akitsu as a girl in realistic skiing costumes who stand on the runaway of the orchestra and sing.

Campers in Rain

Campers in the rain, an iris dance, and a train suggested by the movements of the show girls taken from the Marcus Show are among the 27 scenes, and in the grand ensemble the boys and girls return to realism in black evening suits and blue gowns against a brilliant background of the parading chorus.

Volga Boat Song

The haunting music of the "Volga Boat Song" gives the Takaradzuka girls some of the best lyrics they have yet had to sing, and the stage pictures might well be from the best stages of the capitals of the world. The Russian dancing of the girls and the boat with its masts against a starry sky, the tragedy and the vessel in flames is well worth the price of a ticket to the entertainment if there were nothing more upon the program.

NEW CULTURE DEVELOPING

A new national culture is developing in Japan, Dr. Toyo Okushi declared in addressing a meeting of the Nippon Cultural Federation Tuesday afternoon in the New Osaka building. Dr. Okushi, a member of the Government Research Institute of National Culture, spoke in German on the "Establishment of Modern Japan." Although only 32 years old, he is the author of two books in German on the historical development of the constitution of Japan. He holds a doctor's degree from a German university where he studied political science.

Among the guests at the meeting were three German exchange students in America who are now on their way home, Mr. Sigismund von Braun, Mr. Adolph Exner, and Mr. Jurgen von Oerzen. They will visit in Tokyo for ten days and then will spend three weeks touring the Empire before sailing for home.

Dr. Okushi's talk was translated into English by Prof. Chikao Fujisawa, his colleague in the Government Research Institute of National Culture and a son of the late Dr. Rikitaro Fujisawa, who was well known in educational circles both in Japan and America.

Dr. Okushi declared that the modern Japan is not merely the result of the introduction of western civilization but is also a natural historical development from the feudal Japan. He said the cultural movement in Japan today embraces an assimilation of western ideas and the continuance of many of the original and traditional features of the old civilization.

Just as Japan absorbed ideas from China and from the Buddhists of India while still keeping the best of its native culture, so today it must adopt the best from western civilization while still fostering its own ancient culture. Out of the two, he believed, a new national culture is certain to emerge.

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Good, Well-Protected Coverts Essential For Their Preservation

Before any satisfactory progress can be made in the preservation of pheasant, the existence of good and and well-protected coverts is absolutely necessary; and where these do not exist naturally, the very first action of the game preserver must be to effect their plantations on a scale commensurate with his desires. The pheasants in winter season roost on the branches of trees, protecting them from cold and enemies, even if they betake themselves to freer haunts on fine days, they seldom fail to return at night to their warm roost among the pines.

Any plantation containing a due proportion of pines, or spruce and silver fir, can be readily made a secure roosting place for pheasants, if conveniently situated for the purpose and not too much exposed to violent winds.

The pheasants has a capacious stomach and requires much nutriment, while its timidity soon cause it to abandon those places which are disturbed. It is fond of scorns, beech-mast, the berries of the hawthorn, the seeds of the wild rose, and the tubers of the Jerusalem Artichoke. As long as these and the corn and beans dropped in the harvest can be produced, the pheasant do very well. In the spring it finds abundance of nourishment in the sprouting leaves of young clover etc, but from the commencement of the New Year till spring their wild food affords scanty supply, unless you can contrive to keep it at home by artificial supply of food, it will wander. Boiled potatoes and beans are, perhaps, the two most nourishing things that can be offered in the depth of winter, about 2 roods of the thousand-headed cabbage are a most valuable acquisition to the pheasant preserve. You sow a few ounces of seed in April and transplant the young plants in June. By the time that the harvest are all in, these cabbages will afford a most excellent aliment to the pheasant and are particularly serviceable when the ground is deeply covered with snow.

Feeding Methods

The food necessary to keep together a large stock of pheasant during winter months, and prevent them straying, may be supplied in various modes. The birds may be hand-fed day by day in the same manner as domestic fowls, or from troughs which are so constructed as to prevent the food being accessible to smaller birds, or they may be supplied with small stocks of unthrushed corn, from which to help themselves.

The food used are, maize, Indian Corn, Peas, Beans, Wheat, Barley and Oats, always mixed with quartz grits. It is necessary to provide water and if no small stream exist near by, one must make catch pools for collecting rain water. The following method recommended by Mr. Barnes is worthy of careful consideration.

Pheasant are well-known to require assistance with food of some kind in winter to keep them in good condition and to prevent them from rambling away. Buckwheat should be sown adjacent to their coverts, cut when ripe and intermixed with corn, etc., in straw and placed in little stacks in or near their coverts and spread or shaken about at intervals throughout winter. What is still better is to place their food in huts. Pheasant hut is an open shed with the roof fixed on four posts with a pole all round for rafter plates, the rafters of rough poles tied on with withies thatched first with long fagots tied up with three or four withies of brush wood with all the leaves on, and allow to hang down over the rafter plate. The thatch used should be small brushwood; reeds or straw. An open trellis floor of poles should be raised two feet from the ground and on this the corn in straw should be laid for the pheasants to help themselves. In these huts the pheasants find shelter, comfort, and cover in rough wintry, and severe weather, Care should be taken to have plenty of dry dust on the floor underneath for the pheasants to bask in. This is a most essential provision, for it is quite natural for them to dust to clean themselves. Underneath and on the dusty floor is a safe place, sheltered from frost and etc., to receive any other kind of goods, such as poatoes, Jerusalem Artichokes, mangolds, turnips, Cabbage, Chestnuts, Acorns, Beechnuts, Corn or anything else you wish the pheasants to have.

Rearing Pheasants

With regard to the rearing of pheasants in preserves, but little need be said; the less they are interfered with the better. No good can possibly come from disturbing the sitting hens, but, on the other hand, a great amount of mischief may accrue.

The destruction effected in the preserves during nesting season by Crows, Hawks, Jackdows, Magpies, Jays ,and other egg-eating birds is well known, and can only be remedied by the trapping or shooting of the culprit. The crows are, perhaps, the chief culprit and must be kept down.

The pheasant, from nesting on the ground, is peculiarly exposed to the attacks of four-footed or ground vermin, and the escape of any of the sitting birds and their eggs from foxes, stoats, hedgehogs, weasels, skunks, etc,. appears at first sight almost impossible. This escape is attributed by many, possibly by the majority, of sportsmen to the alleged fact that in the birds when sitting the scent which is given out by the animal at other times is suppressed; in proof of this statement is adduced the fact that dogs, even those of the keenest powers of smell, will pass within a few feet or even less distance, of the sitting pheasant without evincing the slightest cognizance of her proximity, provided she is concealed from sight.

The absence of scent in the sitting pheasant is, most probably the explanation of the fact that foxes and pheasants are capable of being reared in the same preserves; at the same time the keepers are usually desirous of making assurance doubly sure, by scaring the foxes from the neighborhood of the nests by some strong and offensive substance. A very practical gamekeeper writes as follows:—

"If any keeper will find his nests and sprinkle a little gas tar anywhere about them, he will find the foxes will not take the birds. I should, as a keeper, find every nest possible, and dress the bushes, stumps of trees, etc, near the place of such nest, and then keep away entirely till I thought the birds had hatched, as constantly haunting a birds nest is the most foolish thing that can be. When such nests are once found and dressed, let the keeper look out and trap all kinds of vermin, such as cat, stoat, Badger, fitchet, weasel, rat, magpie, hawk, crow, owl, etc."

Another equally efficacious plan, the value of which has been repeatedly proved, is to fill a number of small bottles with, "oil of animal" also known as oil of Hartshorn, "or" Dippels oil" and suspend them uncorked to sticks about 18 inches long and stick two or three round each nest, about a foot from it.

Dangerous Enemy

In the vicinity of dwellings, there is no more dangerous enemy to pheasant than the common cat. Captain Darwin writes it his "Game Preservers manual":-

There is no species of vermin more destructive to game than the domestic cat. People not aware of her predatory habits would never for a moment suppose that the household favorite that appears to be dozing so innocently by the fire is most probably under the influence of fatigue caused by a hard night's hunting in the plantations. How different also in her manner is a cat when at home and when detected prowling after the game. In the first of the two cases she is tame and accessible to any little attentions, in the latter she seems to know as she is doing wrong, and scampers off home as hard as she can go. Luckily there is no animal more easily taken in a trap if, common care be used in setting. Box traps, with drop doors open at both ends, are much the most efficacious, as the victims, whether cats, dogs, rats, and even foxes, walk into them without suspicion, and treading on the platform in the middle, cause both doors to fall simultaneously, when the animal is secured unharmed and may either be liberated or shot in to a sack and drowned. Do not use poisoned meat unless it is absolutely necessary.

Croatians In NY Shed Few Tears For Alexander

Self-Government For Homeland Is Their Goal, Says Billich, Leader In U.S.

Spokesmen for Croatian groups in the United States indicated emphatically October 14 that Yugoslavs of Croatian origin in America would waste little sympathy over the tragic fate of King Alexander, assassinated at Marseilles on Tuesday the week previous, says a recent article in the New York Herald Tribune.

Milan Billich, chairman of the executive committee of the Croatian Circle, an organization of more than 5,000 American citizens of Croatian ancestry who have been working for the liberation of their homeland, asserted that the great majority of his subjects hated the King because of his repressive measures.

King Alexander had misunderstood his mission and had bungled his job, said Mr. Billich; instead of using tact in dealing with internal and external problems, he was concerned more with, revival of absolute monarchy and relying exclusively on force and the army.

Says Revolt Has Gained Impetus

Mr. Billich felt that sentiment would be favorable to the regency, but that in a short time, the dissatisfaction of the Croats would find expression is new demands for self-government.

"It is probable that the army is going to use this dissatisfaction of the Croats," said, Mr. Billich, "and it will probably instigate disorders with a view to establishing a now military dictatorship. This, of course, will bring conditions back to where they were in the last days of Alexander's life, with this difference, that Alexander, the greatest force of the old combination, will be missing. This will open the way for the final steps leading to the freedom of Croatia. The revolutionary movement already has been given impetus. Action is afoot.

"The present Croatian movement has for its aim the liberation of that people and full sovereignty for the State of Croatia. Croats would not like to be free from the Serbian hegemony only to fall under the domination of some other power. For that reason, they are against the interference of neighboring nations.

Holds King Signed His Death Warrant

"There can be no question now of either our approbation or disapprobation of the assassination of King Alexander. The deed is done. The King is dead. Our only concern is to try and see that neither he nor the man who killed him shall have died in vain. The King himself signed his death warrant when he decided to deny to the Croats their demands for freedom and justice, and proceeded to smother their dissatisfaction with his regime of terror and brutal persecution.

"It is hard for a Croat even now to feel any sympathy for the man, about whom there is no doubt in our minds that he was not only one of the men directly concerned in the murder of Stephen Raditch and other Croatian leaders in June, 1928, but probably also the chief instigator of that crime.

"Croats can not forget the many hundreds of their people killed by the King's police and army acting under his orders and with his approbation, and the many Croatian patriots hanged in Yugoslavia, whose death sentences all began with the words, "In the name of His Majesty, King Alexander I."

"The tragedy of Alexander is the tragedy of a man who misunderstood his mission and bungled his job. Had he comprehended the necessity of satisfying the centuries-old desire of the Croats for complete freedom and self-government, had he shown more tact in his dealings with them and with other nationalities in the country, he could have become one of the most popular and successful rulers in modern history.

"Instead, by being more concerned with his plans for the revival of the absolute monarchy form of government and by the decision to rely exclusively on the physical force represented by the army, he died a violent death, hated by the great majority of his subjects."

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Pens And Cages As Important In Raising Birds As The Quality Of Stock

By HANS HUNTER

IV

Having treated of pheasants as wild birds, their rearing and management in enclosed pens and aviaries have next to be considered.

The pens and cages used on the game-farm are equally as important as the quality of the foundation stock. Various types of enclosures have found general favor and there are, of course, an endless number of ways in which general principles may be adaptted to individual requirements.

There are two general types of game bird enclosures: stationary and portable.

Both have been used successfully. Both are now being used by well-known breeders in all parts of England and America. The portable pens are the older and the majority of the books on gamebreeding advocate them.

Yet, it is my opinion that stationary pens are to be preferred. Moving portable pheasant pens takes time and strength. There is constant bother with them where their foundations do not quite fit the surface of the ground closely and the moving wracks even the best made structure so that it wears out much quicker.

Location Important

The location of a game-farm is quite important and this has a direct bearing on the species of birds which are kept and the methods under which they are managed.

Pheasants need plenty of range during their growing period and must have fresh ground as often as that inside their enclosures becomes fouled and the grass eaten.

The land on which the enclosures are to be built should be on the southern slope, on gravelly soil, well-drained and have a thriving growth of grass or weeds or underbrush or young trees. The more cover there is the better it will be for the birds, they need the insect life which comes to dense growths of green stuff. A further assistance is rendered by such a growth during the winter for if it is enclosed by the pens it provides most of the shelter needed by the birds. Where such a plan is impractical this shelter is given by placing piles of evergreen boughs in the corners of the pens. Thus if you have a place which is overgrown with weeds, berry brushes, young trees, jumpers, clovers, etc., it is a wonderful site for your enclosures.

On no account should you pen your birds on a low, marshy spot where water accumulates and remain during spring or after storm.

Game birds need plenty of shade in summer and here again is the advantage of a place where grass and under brush have been allowed to grow rankly.

Prodigious Diggers

Pheasants are prodigious diggers of grass roots and devourers of grass itself. If the birds are permitted to remain on one small location too long they will prepare it wonderfully for a garden. The ground will be made soft, all vegetable growth will be destroyed, and the soil will be amply fertilized. The birds have attended to the plowing and harrowing. Nothing remains but to sow the seed for the next occupants.

For these reasons two pens or double pens are needed for each breeding flock of birds, consisting of five hens and one cock bird. With such an equipment the birds stay in one side, while the grass in the other pen is having a chance to grow.

Pens should be so arranged that the birds may be changed to fresh ground as often as necessary and with as litttle handling, as little commotion, as possible.

This is best done by having two or three or even four enclosures adjoining each other and connected by doorways so that the change from one compartment to another may be effected by simply opening the door and driving the birds through. Thus it is my advice to have one outside door for each block of pens with all the other doors inside.

With the land selected and the general type of enclosure chosen the order for lumber and wire should be sent to the proper dealers.

Each breeding pheasant hen should be allowed at least twenty four square feet of ground on each half of a double pen.

Dolonor, Mongol Frontier Town Is Buddhist Center

On the 14th, when we entered Dolonor we found the streams partially frozen. We made our entry on an ox cart. The motor truck which was taking us there got stuck in a muddy rivulet. In spite of all our exertions it refused to move. We had to pass this second night under a canvas sheet. The night before was worse. Rain had added confusion to our helpless plight in the desert. But it was comparatively warmer that night. We were still in the narrow valleys of hilly Jehol. Now on the last day of our journey we were not far from Dolonor. The icy winds were playing havoc. We walked away from the truck. At the first peasant's hut we hired a cart and proceeded to this town.

One Mohammedan merchant told us that the surrounding country was full of robbers. The present Manchoukuo administration under Japanese guidance is clearing the land of all obnoxious elements and I do not know how far the statement is correct. I have just related the story. But if it is true, it surely reflects credit on the authorities concerned.

Political Significance

According to some other stories, Outer Mongolia and China are trying to control Inner Mongolia. Dolonor, sitting on the fence, has a political significance. It has to watch the tendencies of the numerous Mongolian princes. They want independence from China, they fear Communising and still they are not eager to seek Manchoukuo's protection. I believe our plan of the Golden Land as a district of Asia will satisfy all concerned. Let us work to that end.—M.P.

Movies Getting Better, Is View Of Catholic Body

Federation Of Alumnae Group Approve 90% Of Films Since July 15

Since July 15 there has been a great increase in the percentage of pictures endorsed by the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae, according to a report on October 13 at the organization's biennial convention, at New York, according to the New York Times.

Mrs. James P. Looram of Elmhurst, chairman of the federation's motion-picture committee, who submitted the report, announced that in the last three months "our reviewers have previewed approximately 160 pictures and have endorsed 90 per cent." She added that "we feel confident that if public interest in motion pictures is sustained we may be most optimistic about the future."

The convention opened in St. Patrick's Cathedral with a pontifical high mass, at the close of which Cardinal Hayes read a cablegram from the Papal Secretary of State extending the blessings of the Pope to the delegates. The religious service was the prelude to a discussion at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel of current problems from the standpoint of Catholic doctrine.

Ideal Life Urged

The Cardinal welcomed the visitors from various parts of the country and Canada and counseled the young women to "follow the ideal of the model woman," held up to them by the church. Declaring that the woman of today seemed to be "contributing to the moral evils of the world," the Cardinal urged on the members of the federation to "protest against affecting the sanctity of the home."

At the afternoon session, at which the report to the motion picture committee of the federation was presented, Will H. Hays, President of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributers of America, complimented the members as a group "militant, courteous in its unremitting work for the improvement of pictures," in a letter to Mrs. Looram.

"You have been, perhaps, the most severe of all the groups in your appraisal of pictures, but always your criticism has been specific and you have brought the weight of your opinion directly to the makers of pictures," wrote Mr. Hays. "We appreciate that, as we appreciate your recognition of the basic fact that entertainment is in itself a vital, necessary purpose."

A telegram was received also from Joseph I. Breen, associate of Mr. Hays in Hollywood, who also praised the work of the federation on behalf of the producers "in the cause of a better, a finer, a more wholesome screen."

EVERYTHING YOU NEED TO MAKE YOU PROUD TO OWN IT

IT IS difficult to classify the New Ford V-8. Actually it is a low-price car . . . but the owner recognizes the low-cost factor only when he pays the bills — for the car itself, and for fuel, tires and service.

At all other times he forgets the moderate investment and feels only the pride and satisfaction that accompany the ownership of excellent things. For here is a car that you drive for the sheer joy of driving . . . a car so good-looking and roomy and comfortable, so superior in its quality and performance, that you feel it belongs in the class with the finest cars.

For example, you have to pay more than four times what the Ford costs to get a V-8 engine in any car other than Ford. And until you drive the Ford you cannot appreciate the tremendous difference the V-8 engine makes.

We simply ask you to drive the New Ford V-8. Learn its speed, power and acceleration — its safety and roomy comfort — its dashing beauty and style both inside and out. Then you will know why you are as likely to find it in the garages of pretentious estates as in the possession of people of moderate means.

Arliss At Work In London For $50,000 a Week

Overhead Railway Built To Film Brussels Ball For Film, 'The Iron Duke'

London is becoming prouder every day of her booming film industry, with almost every boat from America bringing stars, directors and even producers, admittedly looking for new fields to conquer. The greatest thrill of all for London is the return of George Arliss, says a London dispatch on October 13 to the New York Herald Tribute. The article continues:

The sixty-six-old trouper, who has seen so little of his native London in the last thirty-three years, is the cock of the walk at the big film plant out on Shepherd's Bush, where he is making "The Iron Duke."

Watching him doing his shots one day as the Duke of Wellington, with clanking sword and a breast covered with medals, left little doubt that nearly everybody in the studio is awed and obedient in his presence.

This may be as it should be, for he is getting $200,000 for four weeks, plus overtime, and it is now certain there will be a couple of weeks extra work with little chance of the picture being completed until late October.

He has brought to London a new regime such as the informal and easygoing studio workers here have rarely experienced.

One rigid rule is that no spectator can "get in the line of vision" when Arliss is acting on the set. It is almost pathetic to see the hangers-on peeping from behind screens or other obstructions, always on guard against meeting the formidable Arliss eye. Even the director, Victor Saville, gets out of sight as much as possible.

Then there is Arliss's portable dressing room, which goes wherever he goes, all over the sets. He must have this room as well as the main permanent star's room in the picture plant.

One day Arliss found some lesser satellites had been using the sacred precincts when he was out of sight. With his own hand he penciled a warning sign outside: "Haircutting, 6 pence. Shave, 3 pence. After 4:30."

The day he was visited by the writer an army of carpenters were making a terrific racket all around him. When asked about the progress of the film Arliss replied, "I'm just hammering away."

In the picture the scene leads up to some sharp remarks between the Duke and Duchess. The Duke, responding to her comment that French people were dead against returning any of Napoleon's spoils, says:

"There's always a strong feeling against the return of stolen property on the part of the burglar."

An incident when this scene was being shot: Arliss made a move to go, with the remark: "The one was just right." It took a bit of subtle persuasion by Saville to get Arliss to go through the same scene three more times.

One of the most impressive scenes in the new picture marks a new high for the Shepherd's Bush studio. At a ball given by the Duchess of Richmond in Brussels on the eve of the Battle of Waterloo, Arliss is followed by an "overhead railway" as he walks in stately manner down a long staircase and the entire length of a 200-foot long hall.

A truck, suspended to an overhead cable and carrying three men and a camera, was constructed to shoot the scene. The camera and the truck itself were each on swivels and, combined with the movement over the cable, permitted a play in moving photography never before attempted in this country.

Le Gallienne as "L'Aiglon"

Selwyn & Franklin's production of "Aiglon," with Eva Le Gallienne, Ethel Barrymore and the Civic Repertory Company, will open at the Broadhurst Theater Tuesday evening, October 30. In "L'Aiglon" Miss Le Gallienne will be seen as the Duke of Reichstadt; Ethel Barrymore as Marie-Louise, Duchess of Parma, formerly Empress of France; Paul Leyssac as Meternich, and Harry Plimmr as Flambeau, a Grenadier. Richard Addinsell has composed a musical score that will be used throughout the play. Clemence Dane, the English playwright, has made a free adaptation of Rostand's drama for this production. "L'Aiglon" was first presented in Paris by Sarah Bernhardt on March 15, 1900. In the same year Maude Adams acted the play at the Knickerbocker Theater.

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Great Care Must Be Taken During Breeding Season For Full Production

By HANS HUNTER
V

From the middle of March through the breeding season, visitors or strangers should not approach the pens if full egg production is to be expected. It also helps if the breeder himself wears the same clothing when he feeds the birds.

Requirements for high egg production are.

1. Good, healthy birds from good strain.
2. Secure enclosures on a well-drained spot.
3. Plenty of good, clean food but not too much.
4. Grit, oyster shells, or calcium grit.
5. Green food.
6. Peace and quiet.

With the approach of Spring you will notice your cock pheasants begin to strut. Their red fleshy cheeks begin to swell and from each side of their heads appears protuberances of skin with tufts of feathers like horns. If you have delayed until now the apportioning of your birds to the breeding pens, this should be done at once. Five or six hens to one cock is the correct proportion. Never have more than one cock in the each breeding pen.

Soon you will notice that the abdomens of your hen pheasants are dropping downwards and becoming enlarged. This means that they will soon present you with the first eggs of the year.

Thorough Examination

These will be layed helter-skelter about the pen. It is a good idea to examine the enclosure pretty thoroughly for the first eggs for they may be deposited under evergreens. Collect them as soon as possible.

Eggs left about the pens for some time after laying tempts the birds to play with them and this is the first step toward chronic egg-eating. Once a bird has discovered that she can break open an egg and that it can be eaten, the game-breeder takes a loss until corrective measures are used.

To stop egg-eating the best remedy is to sacrifice a good egg. Chip a hole at both ends and blow out the white and the Yolk, mix these into a paste with red pepper and pour it back inside the shell, stopping the holes with paraline. Put this egg in the pen and go away, in a few hours your birds will loose all appetite for fresh eggs.

Foster Parents

With the first of those olive colored eggs, kept in cool room away from any possible jarrings, you must get the bantams in broody condition.

The broodiness in a bird is something that cannot be brought about over night nor a condition which we may create when we wish. If you cannot get broody hens, you must turn to incubators.

Pheasant eggs will keep for two weeks in a cool room. But some times eggs will hatch after being kept for a month but it is far better to set them as soon as possible after they are laid, Two weeks should be the limit.

Then if no bantams show signs of broodiness you can put the eggs under a standard hen that is broody or you may use a small incubator until your birds are ready to take up the care of the eggs. They are taken out of the machine at the end of one or two weeks and given to bantams to finish the work.

Brood Coops

About 24 days after you set the first eggs you will have a brood of pheasants to care for. Before they are hatched you should have a coop all ready for them.

The brood coop should be six feet long by three feet wide and eighteen inches high, as per illustration.

The coop have posts 2" x 2", with Board 9", with one inch mesh wire netting tacked to the inside of the boards.

One third of this coop is roofed and boarded tightly with for protection from winds and storms. At the back is a door 9" high and as wide as the coop for the entrance of water fountain and feed dishes.

Safe From Marauders

In front three slates three inches wide and three inches apart are covered by a solid wooden door hinged at the top and fitting level with the bottom boards along the side of the coop. When the birds are 7 to 10 days old they are permitted to go on free range while bantam stays at home to cover them when they come back chilled from their wanderings. The front door is propped open with a stick, the slats confine the bantam while they allow plenty of space for the exit and entrance of the brood. Also this door gives extra shade. By closing it at night when the pheasants are with their mother they are safe from marauders and all the brood may be caught the following day for transfer to another enclosure or for examination for lice.

"Tar-paper" roofing may be put over the roof of the rear third of the coop.

As soon as the frame of the coop is done it should be painted with creosote. File every crack with disinfectant to kill all parasites, lice and mites.

After the creosote is dry tack on the wire netting and the little cage is ready for use.

When your first brood hatches they should be placed in a coop filled with short-clipped grass. Prepare for this now by burning over the selected area and if the new grass is quite long it should be cut with a lawn mower so that it will not be too long when his brood is ready to go out-of-doors.

Leniency Ruling Spanish Trials Of Insurrectionists

President Has Announced He Will Not Sign Death Sentence

MADRID, Oct. 12—Leniency is the keynote of proceedings in the summary courts-martial which have now commenced their task of trying those implicated in the rebellion.

Meanwhile the strike still holds in Madrid, though the city is gradually recovering its normal aspect. The Government claims to be also in full control in the provinces, except Asturias, where surronder of the rebels is said to be imminent.

The first summary court-martial in Barcelona has sentenced Colonel Bosch, in command of the regional militia, to imprisonment for life though he was found guilty of treason. A youth in Madrid has been condemned to 12 years' imprisonment for revolutionary bill-sticking.

President Won't Sign

It is understood that President Zamora has signified his intention to resign rather than countersign a single capital sentence.

In Madrid, though pickets shot a street waterman yesterday, the situation in much easier.

A significant sign of the times is that with comparative tranquillity restored there are now more priests to be seen on the streets than ever before under the republic.

The emergency food supply run by the police and military is being better circulated and shops are beginning to obtain new supplies of staple foods brought in from the outside. Military and police precautions, however, have not been relaxed. Restoration of the supreme penalty has doubtless shaken the rebels. A very strict censorship is now being exercised.

Jail Correspondent

From all reports of the arrest of Manuel Azana, the title of Senor has been eliminated. He is being brought to Madrid and will if necessary be tried by the organism he created, the Tribunal of Constitutional Guarantees.

An American newspaper correspondent, Mr. Edward Hunter, was arrested in San Sebastian on suspicion of having sent out false news, but was released on payment of a fine of 200 pesetas for not registering as a foreigner. Two German newspaper correspondents were arrested.

The revolt in Austrias has now lasted a week.

Germany's Rich Must Aid Poor Says Hitler

Upper 10,000 Will Have To Help Winter Campaign

Germany's upper 10,000 must "pay through their noses" this winter to help the nation through its most difficult period in decades, Reichsfuhrer Hitler told his co-workers in winter relief today amid thunderous applause.

To fulfill their proud boast, "No German will be in hunger or be cold this winter," the National Socialists accelerated their winter relief campain entailing millions of marks and billions of words.

"Last winter's shameful spectacle of the poorer quarters contributing more than the wealthy," Herr Hitler said, "must not be repeated." He drew a lurid picture of previous regime alleged mismanagement in having driven thousands of persons to suicide.

He compared conditions in Germany with these in other countries "where disturbances, revolts and bloodshed are rampant—a situation we have successfully overcome here."

Inaugurating the drive at the temporary Reichstag building, the Kroll Opera House, the Fuhrer forcibly told those in better circumstances they must delve deeper into their pockets to relieve the distress of the coming winter.

Concluding his address dramatically, Herr Hitler said, "Let the Jewish boycotters rage. We shall show them we are masters of our fate."

Herr Hitler's often tried and always successful propaganda system has hit upon "national solidarity" as a campaign slogan and already has produced columns of words underscoring the idea of further demands in sharing the burden.

Preceding Hitler on the stand, Dr. Paul Joseph Goebbels, propaganda minister, gave statistics of the campaign in the previous winter which he said yielded 358,136,040 marks (about $14,325,000) of which less than 1 per cent was absorbed by the costs of administration. He said 16,617,681 persons received relief.

In the coming winter the monthly one dish Sunday dinner again will feature the campaign.

Outwardly there appeared little need for an intensive campaign. Berlin glistens with an air of prosperity in the bright autumn sunshine. Stores are displaying and selling more luxurious fur coats than ever, experts say the grain crops are good, and the number of automobiles in the city is increasing daily.

In spite of these outward signs, the belief is held in some quarters that this winter will be the crucial test of Hitlerism.

Travel Conditions Improved by Work Of League Group

Problem Of Frontier Rail Station Studied—Treaty Disputes Settled

While diplomatic activities of the League of Nations are stealing the limelight, there is quiet progress in settling international difficulties of a less spectacular nature by minor organizations, according to a Geneva despatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

An instance of this is given in the recent report of the Communications and Transit Organization, whose task is to make travel easier. It is now dealing with air transport in Europe, including the possibility of exempting liquid fuel from customs duties; with road traffic, notably the problem of dangerous level crossings; with rail transit, especially regarding the difficulty of frontier stations, and with sea voyages, in which category figure oil pollution and the placing of coastal buoys.

Primarily, the organization has considered legal questions—matters relating to international law on communications—together with economic and technical questions. It has helped to settle disputes concerning the reorganization of various railways in the execution of articles of the treaties. Experience has shown that the methods followed have permitted, in many cases, of friendly arrangements. As regards transport by rail, studies have been continued with a view to framing model conventions to facilitate the conclusion of bilateral agreements about frontier stations.

A question affecting the international regulation of maritime transport has just been submitted at the request of the United Kingdom Government. This is the pollution of the sea by the discharge of oil. The communication from the United Kingdom Government points out that the pollution of the sea by the discharge of oil is increasing.

A draft convention was adapted by an international conference held at Washington in 1926, but since then no agreement based on the conclusions of that conference has been reached. It has been represented to the United Kingdom Government that certain evidence has accumulated in the last eight years which might alter the views then expressed. The Transit Organization will convene experts of the various countries to study the problem more closely.

Method Sought To Keep Danube Open All Winter

Soviet Plan Of Keeping Rivers Free Of Ice To Be Studied

GALATZ, Roumania—Efforts are to be made to maintain freight traffic all winter on the Danube River, between Vienna and the Black Sea, according to a decision of the International Danube Committee at its sitting here.

Since the realization of this plan requires that a track be kept free from ice, traffic experts are to be sent to the Soviet Republic to study the methods used by the Russians for keeping their navigable rivers open in the winter.

The movement of freight up and down the Danube is much cheaper than shipping it by train and no less than six states profits from this waterway, but for several months each year traffic is stopped by the ice.

It is realized that great difficulties have to be faced in undertaking the scheme to keep the river open because usually the river does not freeze over solidly, but is covered with large quantities of loose ice floating rapidly down stream. It its not easy to see how ice breakers can keep a channel open under such conditions and ordinary freight boats cannot long withstand the strain of this floating ice.

Haptmann Faces Trial For Murder In New Jersey

present new evidence that Hauptmann had been working at the Majestic Apartments on March 1, the day of the kidnapping. He said he desired to offer the testimony by Joseph M. Furcht, an employee of the New York City Department of Welfare, who was construction superintendent of the Majestic Apartments at the time of the kidnapping, and E. V. C. Pescia, head of an employment agency at 779 Sixth Avenue.

He explained he had not been able to find Furcht before the hearing in the Bronx and had not known about Pescia because Hauptmann had not been able to remember the name of the employment agency. Pescia had made a statement that he had sent Hauptmann to the Majestic Apartments for a job to begin the following Tuesday, March 1, the defense attorney said.

Mr. Fawcett said that Furcht would testify that he put Hauptmann to work on March 1 as scheduled and that Hauptmann had worked from 8 A. M. to 5 P. M. on March 1 and the same hours on March 2, 3, and 4. Records of Pescia's employment agency were available to support his story, he said.

The defense counsel explained that he had subpoenaed the records of the Reliance Property Management Corporation, which managed the Majestic apartments at the time of the kidnapping, but had been informed that the records prior to March 15, 1932, had disappeared.

Replying for the State, Mr. Boneparth said that the alleged new evidence was contradicated by documentary evidence in the form of employment records of the Majestic Apartment job showing that Hauptmann did not go on the payroll unti March 21, 1932.

"When Hauptmann took the stand himself, schemer that he is," the prosecutor went on, "he couldn't get himself to say definitely where he was the day of March 1. He was leaving himself a loophole when he said that he was either working at the Majestic or at an employment agency.

"He was hiding where he was because of his guilty knowledge," Mr. Boneparth charged.

Mr. Boneparth emphasized that in extradition proceedings the burden is on the defendant to prove conclusively that he was not in the State where the crime was committed at the time it look place.

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Great Care Must Be Taken Of Hens At Brooding And Hatching Period

By HANS HUNTER

VI

In a box or a compartment of a nest-battery, place some upturned sod. Scrape away the dirt in the center so that there is a slight hollowed place to hold the eggs. Cover this sod with a layer of hay or dead grass and sprinkle the whole lightly with water.

Put the hen thoroughly dusted with louse-chase, in the nest with a few dummy eggs. These may be glass eggs or any real eggs that may be available. Cover the nest so that it is dark, the hen cannot escape and yet so that she has plenty of fresh air Leave her alone for 24 hours.

A full day on the nest will give the hen time to settle down, then take her off and feed her, give her a drink, and a little exercise.

After about 15 minutes off the nest, catch the hen and put her back. Two or three days of this will be a good test of her steadiness and insure against her spoiling the pheasant eggs when she gets them on about the 4th day after she was first put on her nest. Make absolutely certain that the hen is broody and steady before giving her the eggs you wish her to hatch.

In absence of properly broody hens, you must use incubators. These machines are made and sold with full instructions which should be followed, but give plenty of moisture and keep the temperature constant at 102 to 103 degrees F.

Moisture

When the bantams are used, the sod on the bottom of the nest supplies a certain amount of moisture. This must be amplified by sprinklings of warm water, about half a pint to a nest, every 3 days. The incubators are equipped with sand trays or sponges for adding moisture, the sand in the tray or the sponge should never be allowed to become dry.

Turning The Eggs

It is very important to turn all eggs during incubation. This is a well recognized fact and most of the incubators come equipped with devices for turning eggs by a lever.

The pheasant eggs are smaller than hen's eggs and bantam foster mother cannot always revolve them as they should be, she may shaffle them a little or she may not bother about turning them at all. If eggs are not turned the embryo chick grows inside the shell in a lopsided position and after a short time becomes fastened in that position and to the nearest portion of the shell confining him. Unturned eggs produce cripples, weaklings, or no birds at all.

When the bantam is taken off in the morning and again in the evening for food, water and exercise, you should sweep your hand over the eggs so that they may be turned over. In incubators the eggs should be turned twice a day and four times a day is better.

Cooling

Setting eggs must be cooled. And this is especially necessary with game-bird eggs. During the first week, after the eggs have been incubated for 24 hours, cool them 15 minutes twice a day; 20 to 25 minutes the second week and about 35 minutes the third week. The time of cooling depends on the temperature of the room where they are set. If it is quite cold the time must be shortened and if it is warm the cooling will take longer. In any event leave the eggs uncovered no longer than is needed for the first blush of warmth to fade from them after the hen leaves the nest or the trays are taken from the incubators.

The length of time necessary for eggs to hatch depends upon their age when set, the steadiness of the heat, periods of cooling, etc. Here is a table for most of the game bird. These periods are the average and may be 2 or 3 days longer, seldom more than one day shorter.

	Days
Pheasant	23
Golden Pheasants	22
Siver Pheasants	26
Manchurian Pheasants	30
Gray Mallard Ducks	28
Mandarin Ducks	30
Greese	30
Bantams	21

About 3 weeks after the eggs were set, there will be one or more eggs with little pipped places on them. Return the hen on the nest at once, close the cover, darken it with a bag and leave her alone for 48 hours with plentiful supply of food and water to carry her over until she can safely leave the nest. Annoying the hen at this time by looking into the nest may cause her to shift in the nest and crush birds just hatched.

Remember, when the eggs start to pip leave them entirely alone for 48 hours.

Should the hatch be completed in an incubator this same caution applies.

Brood's First Meal

Two days should find all the hatchable eggs hatched and the brood ready for its first meal. Where bantams have been used this forty-eight hour period will also be used for teaching to the young pheasants the language of the foster mother. This is imperative for otherwise the little pheasants will not recognize her call and stray and become lost.

On the morning of the third day after pipping the bantam and her brood are taken to one of the brood coops already described. This coop is placed in the sun where it will be protected from the wind and the grass upon which it is set is clean and closely clipped.

You should make certain that the coop is firmly settled on the ground. Hollows under the sides or ends should be filled with dirt or pieces of sod packed tightly in order that none of the young pheasants will find a chance to get out. If the side boards are 8 inches wide and the one inch wire netting is tacked to the inside of these boards the pheasants will not be able to escape until they are capable of caring for themselves to a certain extent.

The next thing is to get a fountain for water, and a shallow dish for feeding grain. A shovelful of gravel placed under the sheltered rear third of the coops as a foundation for the water fountain will provide the brood with all the grit they need and also keep the ground about fountain well drained and clean.

Astonishingly Quick

You will find that baby pheasants are astonishingly quick. Take the bantam from the nest first so that she cannot become excited in there and step on any of the chicks. Then catch the baby pheasants and put them into a basket lined with a blanket that will prevent them from becoming chilled and catch cold.

Should the bantam have an empty crop it is often wise to keep the brood under the blanket while their foster mother picks up a meal of corn and has a drink of water.

For a few minutes, when the birds are put in to the coop, they will scamper about the enclosure, the bantam will call them to share bits of grass and insects and then when they are tired she will collect them all under her feathers and keep them there as long as necessary.

Do not put broods out in the coops in the field if the weather is cold and wet. On such days when the new birds must be taken from the nests, have the coops inside the barn with hayseed on the floor inside them and the gravel and water fountains just as if the coop were out of doors. Here they stay until the first warm, sunny day after the grass has thoroughly dried.

Belgium Reduces Number in Prison By Stressing Cure

New Attitude Toward Crime Removes Stigma From Those Convicted

Belgium's penal policy, which now refuses to recognize a "criminal class," is reported to be resulting in fewer returns visits to prison, says the Brussels' correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

According to Belgian reckoning, the person who commits crime and the criminal are two entirely different individuals and, when the differences between them are properly understood, the existence of the latter is said to be a myth. There are, therefore, held to be no criminals in Belgium.

Such a state of affairs has not always, of course, been so clear to Belgium as it is now. There was a time when, under the influence of the Lombroso School, Belgium regarded any person of criminal tendencies as a "peculiar sort of human being." And there was another time when it believed that criminals were made through "the preponderating influence of circumstances."

During both these periods the criminal appeared real, and it took the work of two sturdy pioneers, Dr. L. Vervaeck and M. Emile Vandervelde, to break the appearance and to herald a new way to thinking by explaining to Belgium that "if one would know the nature of him who commits crime, one must study him as an individual" and must recognize him fundamentally as "good."

Pioneer of Reform

When M. Vandervelde and Dr. Vervaeck made their pronouncement on the subject of "individuality and goodness," they held the respective posts of Belgian Minister of Justice and Director of the Service de l'Anthropologie Penitentiaire, and, being in positions of authority, they were able to give practical expression to their ideas.

They did not, they said, wish to reform the prisons—and it has to be acknowledged that, even now, Belgian prisons are no better materially than are those of many other countries—but they did wish to reform the habit of regarding those who inhabit prisons as basically wicked and as basically different from their fellow men.

In Belgium today the method adopted for bringing about this reform is sponsored by the Service de Anthropologie Penitentiaire and is applied to all prisoners—other than those convicted of political or fiscal offences—who receive sentences of three months or longer.

Immediately upon sentence, every prisoner is confined to his cell for a period of three days. During these three days he is supplied with books and is visited at various times by the prison governor, a minister of his own religion, a prison teacher and one or more prison officials, to one of whom it is hoped that he will confide something, at least, of the nature of his difficulties.

Individual Treatment

In the meantime, investigation of the closest kind is going on into the conditions of his past history and, by careful questioning, by observation, by tests of various kinds, light is being thrown gradually upon the facts of his upbringing and social environment, his family, his physique, his education, his virtues and faults, and upon those matters which have been troubling him.

No possible detail is missed and, when finally his case is reasonably understood, it is considered by a board upon which sit the director of the Service de l'Anthropologie Penitentiaire, the prison governor, prison doctors, teachers, chaplain and officers, with the object of assigning him to that prison which will best assist his cure.

There is more than one kind of prison in Belgium, and it is found to be not difficult to divide between the men who must learn to read and write and the men who must finish, by correspondence, their university courses. An effort is also made to insure suitable occupation, not only for working, but for leisure hours. In Belgium books are provided both by prison and by university libraries, while prisoners are encouraged to organize their own concerts and their own art exhibitions and, furthermore, to produce newspapers written and edited by themselves.

Prisons, those in authority say, should be regarded less as places of punishment than as nurseries of character. Moreover, the age of those who enter them should go unheeded. The habit of regarding all but the very young as "lost cases" is, they declare, pernicious. Nobody needed be a "lost case" once the general public has ceased to regarded him as lost and is ready to accept him as a normal individual whose faults and failings have embroiled him with the law, but who is capable of reform.

Episcopal Budget Set At $2,313,115 At Annual Parley

Foreign Domestic Missions Cut Only Slightly In Total Reduction Of $386,885

A vote to conduct a drive against "filthy and damaging motion pictures," unanimous approval of a birth-control measure by a committee of Bishops and the adoption of an "emergency" budget of $2,313,115 were features of the sessions of the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church here on Oct. 17, says an Atlantic City dispatch to the New York Times. The full account follows:

Confronted by a deficit of $750,000 and declining income, the Bishops and clerical and lay deputies adopted a budget reduced from the $2,700,000 program proposed by the national council of the church. The reduction totalling $386,885 were made chiefly in institutional activities, while foreign and domestic missions, cherished as the chief work of the church, were cut only 10 and 15 per cent, respectively. Confidence was expressed that the entire $2,700,000, which represents an increase in collections from dioceses of $704,043 over contributions this year, would be raised.

The resolutions adopted by the House of Deputies calling for a boycott of "indecent or indecvertised pictures," the formation of a League of Decency in every diocese and Federal control of the motion-picture industry were preceded by a bitter attack on motion pictures by the Rev. Dr. Clifford G. Twombly of Lancaster, Pa.

Federal Control Urged

Immediately after adopting the resolutions, offered by the committee on social service, the deputies voted a resolution offered by the Rev. George Floyd Rogers of Asheville, N. C., to petition the President to use his influence to obtain legislation for the control of the movie industry. The committee resolutions praised the efforts of the Motion Picture Research Council and of the Legion of Decency of the Roman Catholic Church.

The birth-control resolution, which had been submitted to the House of Bishops last Monday, was reported out unexpectedly by the committee on social welfare. The Right Rev. Benjamin Brewster, Bishop of Maine, who is chairman of the committee, read the resolution, which would give "licensed physicians, hospitals and medical clinics freedom to convey such information as in accord with the highest principles of eugenics and a more wholesome family life," but which does not mention birth control.

The Right Rev. James De Wolf Perry, presiding Bishop, stopped debate and a motion to table was voted down with few dissenting votes. They then voted to place the resolution on the calendar. It may be brought up again tomorrow.

The Right Rev. Paul Matthews, Bishop of New Jersey and host to the convention, rose from his seat on the side of the meeting room in Haddon Hall Hotel and strode to the front.

"Is it for this house to endorse so dubious a procedure as this is?" he demanded. "If this thing is going on, let it go on, but why should we endorse it? I move the resolution be tabled."

Later in saying that the social welfare committee was unanimously in favor of the resolution, Bishop Brewster said they were influenced by the fact that physicians specializing in obstetrics wanted the legislation.

Asked about his effort to forestall consideration of the resolution, Bishop Matthews said:

"All these people with their dubious propositions come along and want us to pat them on the back. Why should we do that? Of course, I'm not in sympathy with it. Any man has a right to oppose it. But that does not mean there is not a proper kind of birth control—that's a big subject."

The committee on social service which approved the birth-control resolution, comprised:

Bishop Stires Wins Point

The Right Rev. Ernest Milmore Stires, Bishop of Long Island, won the support of the House of Bishops for the election of a Bishop Coadjutor in his diocese, and the adopted resolution was referred to the deputies for action.

The Bishops also took under consideration a proposal to merge the present suffragan and coadjutor classes of Bishops into a new classification of auxiliary or assistant bishops, and to give the suffragan bishops a vote in the House of Bishops. The same proposals were sent back to committee by the deputies.

The woman's auxiliary re-elected Miss Grace Lindley as executive secretary, and also re-elected members of the executive board.

Prison reform methods should follow the teachings of Christ, who "saw always individual personality," Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State, said in an address tonight before a meeting of the Commission of Evangelism.

"Two-thirds of the population of our prisons are repeaters, habitual criminals," Mr. Sayre said. "Our cell block system, mixing amateur and professional, has turned many of our penal institutions into schools for crime. Eighty per cent of one reform school was found to continue in their life of crime. Christ says this is all dead wrong. Our system hardens the prisoner's personality until he is past redemption."

Another speaker during one of the evening sessions of the convention was the Rev. Dr. Goodrich R. Fenner of New York City, secretary of the Division of Rural Work, Department of Christian Social Science, Protestant Episcopal National Council.

Pheasant Raising Presents Number Of Big Problems

Brood's Diet Must Be Watched Carefully During First Few Weeks

By HANS HUNTER

VII

A few hours after the birds are placed in the brood coop they should be given their first feed. This should be one of the baby-chick starting foods sold on the market. It is important that the consistency of the mash be no more than crumbly-wet when they are fed. Custard also should be given.

Water

All growing birds need plenty of fresh water in clean fountains placed where the sun cannot heat it.

The coops must be moved to fresh grass ground as often as the ground inside becomes soiled.

Milk

This is an admirable food for the young stock and may replace water. Either fresh or sour milk is good. Custard is another excellent starting chick food.

Feeding Schedule

For the first week the crumbly-wet mash is fed 4 or 5 times a day. Just enough for the birds to clean up in twenty or thirty minutes is given them at each feeding. Feeding dishes must be washed clean after each meal.

The bantam foster mother will get her main food from a dipper of corn hung high enough on a nail so that the young birds cannot reach it. Never throw cracked corn for the bantam on the ground inside the coop while the brood is less than four months old. Little pheasant picking up and swallowing the smaller pieces of corn, will choke to death.

Angle worms, chopped to less than ¼ inch and also ants eggs if procurable are good food, for remember, the mainstay of growing pheasants is insects.

The best substitute for ant's eggs is "Custard", made by heating an egg with a table spoonful of milk, and "setting" the whole by a gentle heat. No artificially prepared animal food can surpass this mixture. The egg supplies albumen, oil, phosphorus, sulphur, phosphate of lime and other mineral ingredients.

Fresh and finely-chopped green food, with a small amount of garlic mixed should be fed daily.

Feeding for Second Week

Begining with the 8th or the 10th day after hatching, the broods are fed but three times per day on the same food as before. Sometimes it is possible to get them to eat a good quantity of the dry chick starter sold on the market and if this happens by all means place a small dish of it in the coop where they can get it at all times. The feedings of crumbly-wet mash should not, however, be discontinued because of this.

On the first sunny, warm day after the birds are a week or ten days old the front door of the coop is propped up with a stick and the pheasants allowed to range forth into the rearing field. The slats prevent the bantam from coming out and she stays inside to hover the young birds when they return chilled from the outside.

Always feed the broods inside the coops and at regular intervals. That teaches them to always come inside at feeding time and they will know when to expect you.

The Third Week

The same feeds are given at this period but the daily meals are cut to two. Under normal weather conditions they are out in the field most of the day and pick up a tremendous amount of food there. A period of bad weather that keeps them from going out may call for extra feeding. A well-known English breeder, late Mr. Douglas gives the following:

"The principal food I give for the first 14 days is composed of eggs and new milk, made as follows; In proportion, one dozen of eggs, heated up in basin, added to half a pint of new milk; when the milk boils, add the eggs, stirring over a slow fire for a short period to thicken, when it will form a nice thick custard. This I give for the first three days; then I commence to add a little of the best oatmeal, and any greens the garden produces, finely chopped, for the next 3 or 4 days; after 7 days I add to their diet a little kibbled wheat, being kiln dried prior to kibbling, also split groats and bruised hempseed, occasionally or handful of millet seed; taking care all their food is of the very best and that the feeding dishes are scalded in boiling water daily. This food I use until they are three weeks old, when I add minced meat mixed with oat or barley meal. At five weeks old I consider a feed of good wheat and barley alternately, last thing at night, quite necessary, not forgetting, at this age, to add a little tonic solution of sulphate of iron to their water daily. At this time the growth of their feathers requires a great deal of support, and if the bodily strength is not supported by a strengthening diet they must give way. Continue the custard up to eight weeks old."

Changing Appearance

After a time you will notice that some of your young pheasants are losing the feathers about their faces, their heads will take on a bony appearance and a hard fierce look will come into their eyes. Their body plumage will become sprinkled with darker feathers showing through the youthful tone of brown. On their grayish legs will come hard button-like objects that will grow into spurs. These are the males and when this stage of their growth is reached it is about time to take them from the rearing fields with the females of similar age and let them in to woods or confine them in large pens or breeding pens. This is the age when they know they can exist independantly with the attention of their foster mother.

Brood pens should be placed in the rearing field if possible. The best sites for rearing fields are those which have not been scrupulously farmed for the past two or three years, and should contain a good growth of weeds, brush, and grass. Timothy, Vetch, Oats, Rye, buckwheat and similar grasses and grains may be grown and should be on the rearing field in abundance. The size of rearing field should be about 50' x 50' for one brood of 15 phcasants and an old hay-field or cornfield uncut for a year makes ideal rearing fields.

The perfect rearing field fence is 8 feet above ground. The top four feet of two inch mesh wire netting, the lower four of one inch mesh and a skirt of one inch mesh running down in to the ground for one foot and outward one foot, to prevent digging pests from coming in. If the birds are not for the market but to be put out in the woods for shooting, an extra large breeding pen if first constructed can be used as rearing field as well as winter quarter for the breeding birds.

Gold Bloc Nations Hold Conference To Keep Standard

Delegates Of Seven Countries Agree To Take Steps For Protection Of Group

Delegates of seven European gold bloc nations concluded an unexpectedly successful two-day meeting at Brussels on Oct. 20, with a proclamation of their fidelity to the gold standard and with definite proposals to expand trade within the group and to fortify members against continued pressure from depreciated currencies.

Thus this meeting, which only a week previous every one predicted would fail, must be accepted, by its accomplishments, as one of the most important economic and financial conferences in recent years, says the New York Times.

Its announced determination to maintain existing parities will unquestionably strengthen all gold currencies at a particularly nervous and violent period for the exchange market. It is in fact a hardly disguised warning to Anglo-Saxon countries that that gold bloc, more than ever, is determined to go on its present way what ever happens to the dollar and the pound.

In the commercial field an agreement was reached embodying the French proposals for bilateral negotiations confined to gold bloc countries, and at the same that efforts be made to expand tourist travel and cheapen transportation.

An unusual and daring proposal was adopted which stated the gold bloc hoped for improvement in trade of 10 per cent above what it was from the Summer of 1933 to the Summer of 1934. There was some opposition to this by delegates who feared that setting such a definite goal meant that if it were not reached critics would say the gold bloc was a failure, but those who take the attitude that a particular limit would be a spur to success and that perhaps the 10 per cent could be exceeded won the day.

Jaspar Issues Statement

The following communique was issued after the meeting by Henri Jaspar, Belgium's venerable Minister of Foreign Affairs, to whose energy and persistance in organizing and carrying through the conference can be attributed a great part of the meeting's success:

"The signatory governments, convinced as they affirmed in London, July 3, 1933, that monetary stability is one of the essential conditions for a return to a normal economic situation; considering that in assuring the stability of their currencies they are contributing to a restoration of world economy; confirming their determination to maintain present gold parities of their respective currencies, and recognizing that their common monetary policy implies a development of international exchanges, a development which similarities in monetary conditions existing between their respective countries ought to favor, it is agreed:

"First, to constitute a general commission composed of their respective delegates.

"Second, (A) As regards commercial exchanges, to study how at present it is possible to increase trade between their countries. They consider as desirable that an increease of 10 per cent in the global volume of trade be effected above that from July 1, 1933, to June, 30, 1934.

"(B) To commence without delay bilateral negotiations which should be concluded with a maximum delay of one year.

"(C) To submit a project for an international convention relative to trade propaganda, which they approve in principle, for examination by a subcommittee composed of a representative of each of the signatory governments with the understanding they will draw up a definitive test of a convention for signature within a short time.

"Third, as regards tourism and transportation to constitute two subcommittees composed of representatives of each of the signatory governments whose mission will be to make a report to a general commission on proposals which the latter has under consideration now or which will later be submitted to it.

"Fourth, to convene without delay subcommittees provided for above and to convoke a general commission at Brussels within three months to take account of the status of the work and decide on the continuation of its program without losing sight of the interests of third parties and the necessity of more extended collaboration on an international plane."

Seven Nations Sign Declaration

This declaration was signed by Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, Holland, Poland and Switzerland, the complete gold bloc.

After the meeting the delegates assured newspaper men there had been complete unanimity of views, which seems borne out by the rapidity with which the important decisions were formulated and agreed upon.

Victory for the French viewpoint is considered natural, since the successful carrying out of these general principles depends upon France. What sacrifices France is prepared to make were not divulged today, as they will form part of the negotiations by subcommittees which begin here Monday.

It is to be noted that the problem of reaching accords which do not violate the most-favored nation agreements was left also for those subcommittees.

It was learned incidentally that one important subject under discussion was the possibility of the complete collapse of the German market, and, although nothing was mentioned about it in statements made afterward, there is no question that the delegates kept this in mind and that they considered their work as in part a preparation for a possible disappearance of Germany from world markets.

In any consideration of the meetings' achievements the political consequences to Europe must not be overlooked. France sought economic union with Belgium for years and one reason for that desire was to bind the two countries together so tightly that Belgium's economic interests would lead her to see eye to eye with France along other lines.

Even more important is cooperation with Italy, which needs French economic support and which may therefore be expected to listen more favorably than otherwise to French proposals regarding political questions.

Finally, there is the last-minute entrance of Poland, which joined France for the first time in months in a common endeavor which, it is significant to note, may result in less friendly relations between Poland and Germany.

Agitation in Holland

Pleas for the abandonment of Holland's gold standard policy were made by various outstanding educators, legislators and leaders of industry at a crowded meeting at Amsterdam on Oct. 20 at which the Netherlands Society for Managed Currency was formally founded with an initial membership of about 500.

Speakers assailed the government's gold standard policy, declaring it has proved disastrous for Holland's industries, her agriculture, horticulture and vritually all other fields of the country's economic life. They challenged supporters of the government's policy publicly to adduce reasons why the gold standard should be maintained, the government itself, according to the speakers, having dodged this issue thus far.

One speaker, a Catholic member of Parliament, representing agricultural and horticulural interests, pointed to Denmark, asserting the Danish authorities admitted the devaluation of the crown proved the only effective remedy against the agricultural depression.

This speaker added that the Netherlands Government exaggerated its currency's juridical character, but failed to grasp its social character. The gold standard, he said, was in conflict with social justice.

The key speech was delivered by Dr. Goudrian, well-known engineer and former professor at the Delft Technical Academy, who is now technical counselor to the Philips lamp concern. He declared the gold standard in Holland in the present conditions, with a majority of other nations having gone off gold, was a millstone around the neck of industry and agriculture. He said it was mainly responsible for existing unemployment, thereby tremendously weakening Holland's economic power.

Dr. Goudrian cited approvingly a recent statement by the London chamber of commerce, in which it pointed to "the old standard's anachronism in the twentieth century."

He argued Holland should have abandoned the gold standard together with Great Britain; having failed to do so, she should have seized the occasion when the United States followed suit. In his opinion this would certainly have prevented much unemployment and misery.

He declared he was opposed to inflation just as strongly as the Netherlands Government, but it had been proved by Great Britain, the United States and Scandinavian countries that devaluation did not necessarily lead to inflation.

He concluded that economic cooperation with countries of the so-called gold bloc especially with France, was detrimental to Holland's interest, as Holland was in a different position in every respect from these nations. Neither national nor international interests were involved for Holland in upholding the gold standard, he said, and it was high time she should take her destiny in her own hands.

The newly formed society intends to influence public opinion by all the legitimate means at its command.

War Against War Is Declared By Episcopal Church

Resolution Adopted After Long Debate Over Report Of Committee Of 10

A resolution urging "unremitting war against war" was adopted by the house of deputies of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States on Oct. 22 at Atlantic City after a long debate over a report of the committee of ten dealing with national and international affairs, says a recent report in the Christian Science Monitor.

The resolution adopted took the form of a substitute for the resolution submitted by the committee, whose report was strongly criticized when it came up for consideration by the general convention last week, some of the delegates characterizing it as "straddling, non-committal" and as practically repudiating the bishop's pastoral, known as the Davenport pastoral, of last November.

Offered by Dean Washburn

The resolution adopted today was offered by the Rev. Henry Bradford Washburn, Dean of Cambridge Theological Seminary, and follows:

"That we affirm that war as a method of settling international disputes is incompatible with the teachings of Christ, and that when nations have bound themselves by treaties, other nations should refuse to countenance their going to war. The Christian church must wage an unremitting war against war."

Mr. George Wharton Pepper, onetime United States Senator from Pennsylvania and Secretary of the committee of ten, characterized the language of this resolution as that of the Kellogg-Briand Pact.

Strong support of the convention going on record against war developed at the meeting today. The Rev. Elmore McKee, of Buffalo, declared that the most important thing for the convention to do was to convince the American public that it was not a reactionary body.

Fearless Leaders
